The petitioner then further represents "that he has often requested said railroad company to comply with the provisions of said ordinance in regard to said fare, and especially the provisions contained in said § 8 of said ordinance, that provides as follows: 'That the fare between any point on said railroad in the village of River Forest and any of the said points in the city of Chicago, or the said point of connection of said railroad with any elevated railroad as aforesaid, and any intermediate points, shall not exceed the fare charged at any point in the town of Cicero west of the east line of Central avenue, or in the village of Harlem, or in either of them, to the same point or return, either for single trip or at commutation rates, or otherwise.'" Thereupon the petitioner prays for issuing of writ of mandamus, directed to the company, its officers and agents, "that so long and at such times as said Suburban Railroad Company shall sell or cause to be sold tickets of twelve rides for $1, good for one continuous ride from any stopping place in the town of Cicero west of the east line of Central avenue over the railroad lines of said Suburban Railroad Company and the said Lake Street Elevated Railroad Company to and from any point on the Union Loop, in the city of Chicago, said Suburban Railroad Company shall also sell, or cause to be sold, on demand, passenger tickets of twelve rides for $1 each, good from any stopping point on its said railroad line in the village of River Forest, over the lines of the said Suburban Railroad Company and the said Lake Street Elevated Railroad Company to and from any point on the said Union Loop, in the city of Chicago, with equal facilities for the purchase of said tickets, and that said Suburban Railroad Company shall furnish its passengers a continuous trip between all stopping points on its said line in the village of River Forest to any station on the Union Loop line in the city of Chicago at a rate of fare not exceeding ten cents for one continuous ride either way between said points, and not exceeding the fare charged at any point in the town of Cicero west of the east line of Central avenue in said town to the same point on said Union Loop or return, either for single trip, or at commutation rates, or otherwise, and that such further orders may be made in the premises as justice may require."

The respondent company interposed a demurrer to the petition, and the relator entered his joinder in demurrer, and the cause was submitted for determination to the court.

Messrs. Knight & Brown, for respondent, in support of demurrer to petition:

The duty, if any, owing by respondent, was one arising under contract, and cannot be enforced by mandamus.

On petition for rehearing.

There is not a single statement in the petition, nor a single sentence in the ordinance, that indicates or shows that the respondent was operating a railroad upon or along any street, but, on the contrary, it shows that it was operating a railroad over a private right of way.

The ordinance before the court in this case authorizes the company to use the cars to convey passengers and their ordinary baggage and express matter; thus showing that it was not intended nor proposed in passing this ordinance that the town was treating of a street railroad. It is a matter of common knowledge that street railways are not used for the purpose of carrying express matter.

Boggs, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The objection that the petition is not verified by a sufficient affidavit has been obviated by an amended affidavit filed by leave of the court.

It is urged that the writ is here sought to be availed of for the purpose of securing the fulfillment of the terms and conditions of a private contract, and that it is fundamental law that mere contract obligations cannot be enforced by mandamus. The appellee is a quasi public corporation. The sovereign power, when granting a public franchise to corporations of that character, may declare that certain acts, in the nature of duties to the public shall be performed by the corporation to or upon whom the franchise is conferred, and may provide that the investiture of the franchise shall be conditional upon the acceptance of the burden of performing such acts or service. It is now well settled that, when there is a grant and acceptance of a public franchise involving the performance of such acts or service, the corporation accepting the franchise may be compelled by the writ of mandamus to perform the duty so enjoined by the grant, and consented to by the acceptance thereof. Merrill, Mandamus, §§ 27, 157, 159; Haugen v. Albina Light &

Water Co. 21 Or. 411, 14 L. R. A. 424, 28 Pac. 244; Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. State ex rel. Lawrenceburg, 37 Ind. 489; Potwin Place v. Topeka R. Co. 51 Kan. 609, 33 Pac. 309; San Antonio Street R. Co. v. State ex rel. Elmendorf (Tex. Civ. App.) 38 S. W. 55.

But it is insisted that the authority granted the respondent company by the ordinance under consideration is not a franchise, but a mere license, and which, having been acted upon, has become irrevocable; and Belleville v. Citizens' Horse R. Co. 152 Ill. 171, 26 L. R. A. 681, 38 N. E. 584, is cited as in support of the contention. The general assembly, representing the people at large, possesses full and paramount power over all highways, streets, alleys, and like public places in the state. Had the charter which gives life to the respondent company been granted upon the conditions expressed in the ordinance under consideration, and had the company accepted such charter as it did the ordinance, and acted under it in like manner as under the ordinance, the enforcement of the service and duties imposed by the charter might, it is clear, have been accomplished by the aid of the writ of mandamus, though the right obtained by the charter to enter upon the streets of the village be in such case but a license. The state does not, however, exercise directly that full, paramount power which it possesses over streets, alleys, etc.; but in the distribution of governmental powers the general assembly adopted the policy of selecting the cities and villages of the state as governmental agencies, and delegating to such municipalities the power to regulate and control the use of the streets, alleys, etc., within their respective limits. Such power thus delegated is exercised by the municipal authorities acting in behalf of the state for the benefit of the public. While it is true that the charter of a street-railway corporation is granted under the general laws of the state, yet a charter so obtained gives but the bare power to exist. In order to enable such a corporation to carry out the sole purpose for which it has existence, it must have a further exercise of sovereign power in its behalf. Some city or village clothed, by delegation, with authority to exercise sovereign power possessed by the state, must grant such corporation authority to enter upon its streets and alleys and construct and operate its road there. The power possessed by the state to attach as conditions to such a grant the performance of duties owing by a quasi public corporation to the public, and directly beneficial to the public, may be exercised by a municipality in the exercise of the power by it possessed by delegation from the state to permit the use of its streets, alleys, and public places by the corporation. It is clearly shown by the petition and ordinance that the respondent company is operating a street railway. It was invested with corporate life, and was granted corporate powers to enable it to serve the public as a public carrier of passengers. Its property is impressed with a public use, and it must exert its powers for the benefit of the public. It is not a private, but a quasi public, corporation, and owes it as a duty to the public to demand reasonable rates only for the transportation of passengers, and to serve its patrons without unjust discrimination, and this duty may be enforced by the state acting directly or through a governmental agency. Rogers Park Water Co. v. Fergus, 178 Ill. p. 571, 53 N. E. 363, and authorities cited. The ordinance, the acceptance thereof, and the enjoyment of the benefits of its provisions by the respondent company must be regarded as establishing, so far as the respondent company is concerned, and as estopping it to deny, that the exaction of a greater sum for the transportation of passengers from its stopping places in the village of River Forest to the city of Chicago than is demanded for the like service from stopping places on its line within the specified portion of the town of Cicero is an unreasonable exaction, and unjust discrimination against those of the public who may desire to reach Chicago from the village of River Forest by way of the cars of the respondent company. That being established, compliance with the provisions of the ordinance in the respect named becomes a duty to the public, the performance whereof is within the right and power of the village, acting as the agency of the state, to secure by means of the conditions incorporated in the ordinance. The fact that the ordinance required that the company should formally accept it as conditioned had no effect to render the grant a mere private contract. The state, through the village as its representative, was acting, and the power which was exercised by the village was that of the sovereign. That which the ordinance required the company should do and should consent to do did not become mere contract obligations on the part of the company to perform acts beneficial to the village. The village, as a corporate entity, had no interest whatever in the acts to be performed. Compliance with the ordinance in the respect under consideration was not beneficial to the village in its corporate capacity, but was a duty to the public to be performed by the company for the benefit of the public. There is nothing in the nature of that duty rendering it impracticable to enforce the performance of it by the writ of mandamus, and, in our view, the writ may be invoked to secure observance by the respondent company.

Respondent, treating the duties imposed upon it as mere contract obligations, argues that the undertakings are wholly without consideration. In the absence of the ordinance, the respondent company had no power or right to enter upon the streets of the village, and erect poles, string wires thereon, and construct and operate its road by electricity upon and along such streets. These privileges constitute ample consideration, if any could be deemed necessary. The privileges granted the respondent company by the terms of the ordinance have been, and are being, fully enjoyed by it. It cannot be permitted to take and retain all advantages and benefits of the ordinance, and escape performance of duties to the public upon which its rights to such advantages and benefits are predicated, upon the ground that the ordinance and the duties imposed by it are ultra vires both the village and the respondent company. The plea of ultra vires will not, as a general rule, prevail, when it will not advance justice, but will, on the contrary, accomplish a legal wrong; and it is a general rule that undertakings, though they be ultra vires, will be enforced against quasi public corporations, if said corporations retain and enjoy the benefits of concessions granted on condition such undertakings should be performed. Hcims Brewing Co. v. Flannery, 137 Ill. 309, 27 N. E. 286; Kadish v. Garden City Equitable Loan & Bldg. Asso. 151 Ill. 531, 38 N. E. 236; Eckman v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 169 Ill. 312, 38 L. R. A. 750, 48 N. E. 496.

Whether mandamus will lie to require the respondent company to transport passengers beyond its own line does not arise. It appears from the petition that the respondent company has perfected running arrangements with other lines of railroad, and is engaged in transporting its passengers, by means of its own cars and the cars of connecting lines, to and around the loop in the city of Chicago, and that it offers such service at all points in the village of River Forest; and the complaint is that it exacts a greater rate of fare for twelve continuous rides from points in the village of River Forest to and around the loop in the city of Chicago than is charged for a like number of rides from the designated points in the town of Cicero, contrary to its duty and obligation under the ordinance. The purpose of the petition is not to require the respondent to make arrangements with connecting carriers to carry passengers beyond its own line, for such arrangements already exist, and the respondent company is engaged in the business of furnishing transportation from the village of River Forest to and from the city of Chicago; but the design of the writ is to prevent discrimination in rates charged at points in the village and in that portion of the town of Cicero specified in the ordinance.

There is no force in the point, vigorously pressed, that, if mandamus will lie, it cannot be granted at the application of the relator in this petition. The village, in its corporate capacity, has no interest in the enforcement of duties owing by the company to the public. As a corporate entity, the village is not affected by compliance or noncompliance with the rates of fare charged or collected by the respondent from the passengers. The writ relates to a matter affecting the public. The people are regarded as the real party, and it need not appear that the relator has any legal interest in the result. It is enough that he is a citizen, and is interested, as a citizen, in having the right enforced. Pike County Comrs. v. People ex rel. Metz, 11 Ill. 202; Ottawa v. People ex rel. Caton, 48 Ill. 233; Hall v. People ex rel. Rogers, 57 Ill. 307. The demurrer must be, and is, overruled.

in case the demurrer be overruled, it be allowed to raise an issue of fact, and in support say, "The company is not selling the twelve fares for $1, and was not at the time the petition was filed." The facts averred are that the respondent company did on or about March 2, 1898, offer, and has since then offered, such tickets for sale from said points in said town of Cicero, and the petition set forth a copy of such tickets sold by the company, and a copy of the following notice posted by the company in the cars operated by it, viz.:

Notice.

On and after Wednesday, March 2, 1898, tickets will be sold—twelve rides for one dollar—by conductors on the cars of this company, good for one continuous ride, from stopping points in the town of Cicero over this line of the Suburban Railroad Company and the Lake Street Elevated Railroad and around the Union Loop in the city of Chicago; the use of the tickets to be governed by the rules of the respective railroad companies.

J. M. Roach,

President Suburban Railroad Co.

The petition further avers that the respondent refused to sell like tickets good from points in the village of River Forest. The facts which counsel say that they desire to establish, if an issue of fact is raised, it will be observed, do not meet the case made by the averments of the petition, but in truth amount to an admission that the averments of the petition are true, but that the company had stopped selling the tickets at the time when the petition was, after leave given, filed in this court, and had not sold such tickets since the filing of the petition. The facts so stated in effect concede the averments of the petition to be true, and the entire argument of counsel for the respondent is that it has full legal right to sell the commutation tickets from points in the town of Cicero, and to refuse to sell such tickets from points in the village of River Forest. It is manifest that the only real issues in the case are those of law raised by the demurrer. The statute does not govern the practice in mandamus suits begun in this court. People ex rel. Cunningham v. Thistlewood, 103 Ill. 139. This court, in its discretion, may or may not allow an issue of fact to be made after the case has been submitted on demurrer to the petition. People ex rel. Damron v. McCormick, 106 Ill. 184. It is manifest that, in the exercise of a sound discretion, we should proceed to final judgment on the issue of law on which both parties have been fully heard.

The judgment of the court is that a peremptory writ of mandamus issue, commanding the respondent, said Suburban Railroad Company, that at all times when it shall sell or cause to be sold said tickets of twelve rides for $1, good for one continuous ride from any stopping point in the town of Cicero west of the east line of Central avenue, in said town, over the lines of said Suburban Railroad Company and the said Lake Street Elevated Railroad Company to and from any point on the Union Loop in the city of Chicago, said Suburban Railroad Company shall also sell, or cause to be sold, on demand, passenger tickets of twelve rides for $1 each, good from any stopping point on its said railroad line in the village of River Forest, over the lines of said Suburban Railroad Company and the said Lake Street Elevated Railroad Company to and from any point on the said Union Loop in the city of Chicago, with equal facilities for the purchase of said tickets as prayed in the petition.

A penal ordinance prohibiting any colored netting or other material which has a tendency to conceal the true color or quality of the goods, to be used for covering any box, basket, or other package of fruit, berries, or vegetables of any kind, is a vexatious and unreasonable interference with and restriction upon the rights of dealers in fruit, and is therefore void when based only on the general police power of the city.

be sold, offered for sale, or had in possession for the purpose of being sold or offered for sale. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than $10 or more than $25 for each offense." The testimony tended to show that the defendant below sold peaches in baskets covered with red tarlatan,—a perforated cloth,—and that these baskets of peaches had been shipped to him from the state of Michigan, put up in the same manner in which he sold them. There was some evidence to the effect that this colored netting tended to conceal the "true color or quality" of the fruit, and some to the contrary. It appears from the record that large quantities of fruit put up in this manner are shipped and sold; that a covering of some kind is necessary to prevent loss of the fruit by pilfering and other means, and to protect it from insects; that such fruit requires ventilation; and that experience has demonstrated that a covering of netting is better than one of wood, paper, or other material, because it allows free access of air, does not bruise the fruit, and affords better means of inspection. The case seems to have turned below upon the color of the netting used, although there was testimony to prove that white, green, or blue netting (sometimes, but less frequently, used) would also conceal to some extent the true color or quality of the fruit. The case assumed some importance, as it appeared from the evidence that red tarlatan manufactured for the purpose has come into general use by packers and shippers of and dealers in fruit, and counsel say that many other cases are pending, to be finally determined by the decision of the case at bar.

Some minor questions have been raised, having reference to the admission or exclusion of evidence, and also to the point that as the evidence showed that plaintiff in error did not himself cover or cause to be covered with the colored netting the baskets of peaches which he had for sale, but merely offered them for sale as he had received them, he did not come within the ordinance. These minor questions may well be waived, and the case considered on more meritorious grounds, involving the validity of the ordinance. Nor have we thought it necessary to consider the point made by the plaintiff in error, that the ordinance is not a mere local inspection law, but is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce, and to restrict the sale of goods in the original packages in which they were shipped from other states, and is therefore void, but are of opinion that the objection that it is void for unreasonableness was well made, and should have been sustained. We have reached the conclusion that the ordinance is a vexatious and unreasonable interference with and restriction upon the rights of dealers in certain articles of trade and commerce. The only valid basis upon which such a regulation can rest is that its purpose is to prevent deception, and imposition upon buyers of such articles as are named in the ordinance. The evidence shows, as common observation would teach, that such packages must have some covering, and shows, also, that tarlatan has been found the best and most suitable covering for the preservation of fruit so packed and sold; and the validity of the ordinance is made to depend, and indeed its validity is defended only, upon the question of the color of the material. It is not pretended that there is anything in red tarlatan which is deleterious to health, or which imparts to the fruit any noxious material or quality, but only that it tends to impart to the fruit beneath a more wholesome tint or appearance than it would otherwise have. It is natural, and not unlawful, for the packer and dealer to put up and offer for sale his goods in an attractive form; and a regulation would not seem to be reasonable which would prevent the dealer in certain commodities from offering for sale his goods in packages tinted so as to correspond in some degree with the color of the goods themselves. No buyer who is ordinarily careful and intelligent is deceived by such devices of tradesmen. He may examine what he buys, and no law can protect him from the consequences arising only from his own folly. At most, the colored netting would tend to conceal the true color or quality of only the top layer of the fruit in the package, leaving the same latitude for deception as in cases where no covering is used. It will be noticed that the provision in question of the ordinance does not make it unlawful to sell decayed or unwholesome fruit, or to practice deception on the public by methods employed in packing or displaying it. From whatever view the ordinance is regarded, it is difficult to see how it can be of any public benefit whatever; and while, ordinarily, that is a question for the municipal legislature, it may be considered by the courts in determining the question of reasonableness. It is not contended by counsel that the power to pass such an ordinance is in terms conferred on the city council by any act of legislature (Lake View v. Tate, 130 Ill. 247, 6 L. R. A. 268, 22 N. E. 791), but the power to enact it is referable to the general police power of the city; and it is conceded that the question of its reasonableness is open for decision, and is the subject of fair contention in the case. It was shown, and is a matter of common knowledge, that much fruit is shipped and sold wrapped up in tissue paper and in tinfoil, and in packages and baskets covered with wood, all of which material effectually conceals the "true color and quality" of the fruit, until removed. It would be as reasonable to prohibit the one as the other. Fruit dealers would be subjected to unjust and oppressive discrimination by the enforcement of such an ordinance. Being unreasonable and oppressive in character, the ordinance is void, and should have been so declared by the court below.

The judgment is reversed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

W. K. ANDREWS, Appt.,
v.

ROANOKE BUILDING ASSOCIATION & INVESTMENT COMPANY.

(.....Va.....)

1. The statute of limitations does not run against the right of a withdrawing stockholder in a building and loan association to compel payment of his demand, until a fund accrues out of which, in accordance with the charter and by-laws of the association, his claim should be paid.
2. Notice of withdrawal, given by a member of a building and loan association, does not sever his relation so completely as to preclude him from bringing a suit for the appointment of a receiver and the winding up of affairs of the company, when it has failed in its duty to set apart a fund to meet its obligation to withdrawing members, and the stockholders have taken such action as to preclude the possibility of relief from that source.

(July 5, 1900.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Hustings Court of Roanoke City sustaining a demurrer to a complaint filed to wind up the defendant corporation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. Hamilton Graves, for appellant:

No right of action accrues to a withdrawing member of a mutual building and loan association until there are funds in the treasury which, under the by-laws, are applicable to the payment of his claim.

Heinbokel v. National Sav. Loan & Bldg. Asso. 58 Minn. 340, 25 L. R. A. 215, 59 N. W. 1050; Engelhardt v. Fifth Ward Permanent Dime Sav. & L. Asso. 148 N. Y. 281, 35 L. R. A. 289, 42 N. E. 710; Pawlick v. Homestead Loan Asso. 15 Misc. 427, 37 N. Y. Supp. 164; Schout v. Conkey Ave. Sav. Aid & L. Asso. 11 Misc. 454, 32 N. Y. Supp. 713; Texas Homestead Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Kerr (Tex.) 13 S. W. 1020.

Had petitioner brought an action at law immediately after perfecting his notice of withdrawal, to recover the amount due him, a full answer to his action would have been that the defendant was a mutual association, and its by-laws were a contract between it and the plaintiff, and that there were no funds in the treasury, under the by-laws, out of which he could be paid.

Homestead, Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Kerr (Tex.) 13 S. W. 1020.

No right of action accrued to petitioner five years prior to the institution of his suit.

Messrs. Cooke & Glasgow for appellee.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant instituted his suit in the hustings court of the city of Roanoke, on behalf of himself and all other creditors of the appellee on the 30th of September, 1898, in which he states that he is the owner of ten shares of the stock of the company, upon which he had paid $500 in monthly instalments of $10 each; that on the 20th of April, 1893, he gave notice of withdrawal to the company in due form; that under the by-laws, as they then existed, his notice did not become effective until the 20th of the ensuing May; that on the 15th day of April, 1893, at a meeting of the stockholders, a change was made in the by-laws, the effect of which was to create a specific sum out of which withdrawals could be paid, which was limited to one quarter of the amount paid into the association by the holders of instalment stock; that as of May 15, 1893, there were in existence 1,643 shares of instalment stock, monthly payments upon which would have produced something more than $400; that a number of said shares have been paid for and discharged, and the residue have all been converted into paid-up stock under the amendments of the by-laws of May 15, 1893, with the exception of twenty-two shares, for which notice of withdrawal had been filed prior to May 15, 1893, and of which the shares of appellant constitute a part; that at a regular annual meeting of the stockholders, held on the 15th of April, 1898, further amendments to the charter and changes in the by-laws were proposed, and to that end a petition was presented to the judge of the hustings court, who entered an order as of the 19th of July, 1898, making the amendments asked for, by virtue of which, whenever there happens to be as much as $500 in the treasury, the company notifies its stockholders, and invites bids from them, the member offering the largest number of shares of stock to be canceled for the least amount of money being accepted. It appears that there is not, and never has been, in the treasury of the company, a fund applicable to the demands of the appellant; nor can there be in the future, since there are no longer any contributing members.

There are other averments of fact in the bill, the tendency of which is to strengthen the position of the appellant, but enough has been said to enable us properly to present our conclusions with respect to the law of the case.

The defendant demurred, and also filed a plea of the statute of limitations, setting forth that the cause of action did not arise within three or five years before the institution of the suit.

The position occupied by a withdrawing member of a building association is not very clearly defined by the authorities. It is said that he is not in all respects a creditor, for, if that were so, he might get judgment, issue an execution, acquire a lien upon real estate, and subject the personalty of the association, to the prejudice of other creditors. He is no longer a member of the association, so far as his right to participate in its management and control is concerned. He has no right of action against the company until a fund accrues out of which, in accordance with the charter and by-laws of the company, his debt should be paid; and, as it appears from the averments of this bill that no such fund existed at any time in this case, it would seem that the right of action has never accrued to him as a creditor. If this be true, then it follows that his right to sue is not affected by the statute of limitations; but, if he is to be regarded only as a creditor, he is still out of court, because there was no right of action which entitled him to be in court. A member of such an association must, upon withdrawal, retain some relation to the company, growing out of his membership, other than that of creditor. It seems to us that by so much as he falls short of being clothed with the rights of a creditor, by so much there must remain in him the residuum of his rights as a member; otherwise, as in the case at bar, he could not sue as a creditor, because there was no fund out of which his debt could be paid, and the company, by its dereliction of duty, would deny all redress if he is not permitted to seek a remedy in his capacity as stockholder. These propositions seem to be supported by authority.

In Heinbokel v. National Sav., Loan & Bldg. Asso. 58 Minn. 340, 25 L. R. A. 216, 59 N. W. 1050, the supreme court of Minnesota held that a member of an association who has brought himself within the rules by notice of withdrawal cannot bring an action, and take judgment against the association, when there is no money in the treasury legally applicable to the payment of his claim. To the same effect, see Engelhardt v. Fifth Ward Permanent Dime Sav. & L. Asso. 148 N. Y. 281. 35 L. R. A. 289, 42 N. E. 710.

In support of the position that a withdrawing member has not lost all of his right or interest as such in the association, there are numerous decisions and the authority of respectable text writers.

"The right of members to presently withdraw deposits is practically limited to funds on hand, and the withdrawing member must show that there are funds for that purpose before he can enforce his demand: but it is an abuse of discretion for the directors to so invest the entire funds in real estate as to leave none applicable to the payment of withdrawing members, and thus defeat their rights. When notice of withdrawal is given the association, it should arrange the disposition of its receipts so as to meet its payments when due. While the right to withdraw is only grantable out of funds designated for that purpose, it is not intended that rightful lack of funds shall defeat the right as against the members. So, if the association is solvent, and a member gives notice of withdrawal, and the notice had matured before the association is being wound up, he is entitled to be paid out of the assets, after outside creditors, in priority to those members who had not given notice, notwithstanding the fact that, after he had given the notice, there were no funds for payment. The intention of the rule is to prevent the application of the funds to withdrawals to such an extent that its operations will be crippled; and, when it winds up, the reason of the rule does not apply, which readily defeats the application of the rule itself." Thompson, Bldg. Asso. chap. 8, § 13.

It is said in Endlich, Bldg. Asso. 2d ed. § 514, where the demands of all the members of such a corporation cannot be paid in full, there are ordinarily several classes advancing contradictory claims, "to wit, members who have given notice of withdrawal, and the period of whose required notice may have expired before the proceedings to wind up were instituted, and members who have given no such notice. . . . The tendency of the English courts, whilst recognizing that a withdrawing member is not a creditor of the association in the ordinary sense of the word, has been to allow them a preference supposed to be based in the rules of the society over those who have given no withdrawal notice."

In Sibun v. Pearce, L. R. 44 Ch. Div. 354, Lindley, L. J., says, of the position of one who has given notice of withdrawal, but has not received payment: "That he is not an ordinary creditor is plain. He cannot come into competition with outside creditors. On the other hand, as between himself and the continuing members, he is entitled to be paid the amount due to him before they can divide the assets. In that sense he is a creditor, though he cannot take part in the affairs of the society."

We have seen that a withdrawing member cannot sue until a sufficient fund is accumulated by the society to meet his demand, for until that event has happened he has no right of action, and it is well established that the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the right of action accrues. We have seen that it is the duty of the association to set apart a fund to meet its obligation to withdrawing members, and it conclusively appears from the bill under consideration that this duty in this instance has not been performed, and that the course taken by the stockholders precludes the possibility that appellant can obtain relief from that source.

The prayer for relief asks the appointment of a receiver, and, if need be, the winding up of the affairs of the company. This prayer, upon the facts presented by the bill, is sufficient to entitle the appellant to the relief which he seeks, if, upon a hearing on the merits, he is able to establish by proof the case which he has made in the pleadings.

The decree of the Hastings Court must be reversed, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in, in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

CENTRAL STATE BANK

v.

S. R. SPURLIN, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The addition of the word "trustee" to the name of the payee of a note does not destroy its negotiability.
2. Mere negligence in making inquiries as to the validity of negotiable paper before purchasing does not charge one with notice of infirmities.

(April 14, 1900.)

APPEAL by defendant from the judgment of the District Court for Hardin County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. J. Moir and John Porter for appellant.

Messrs. Albrook & Lundy and William B. Brown for appellee.

Waterman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The note sued on is in the following form:

Marshalltown, Iowa.

May 27, 1896.

Twelve months after date, for value received, I promise to pay to J. M. Fitzgerald, trustee, or order, two hundred and fifty dollars, payable at Marshalltown Bank, with interest at 6 per cent per annum, payable annually, 6 per cent on interest due, and, if action is commenced hereon, a reasonable attorney's fee, and hereby consent that any justice of the peace may have jurisdiction on this note.

[Signed]

The pivotal question to be determined is, Was this note negotiable? When a conclusion is reached upon this point, all of the other matters argued can be disposed of readily. The claim is that the payee of the note was not certain; that the word "trustee," following his name, makes it evident that some person other than Fitzgerald was interested in the note, as payee, and because of this the negotiability of the instrument was destroyed. If the word "trustee" is to be construed as mere matter of description, then Fitzgerald would have a right of action on it in his own name, and its negotiability would not be affected. Mr. Daniel in his work on Negotiable Instruments (vol. 1, § 415), says: "If a note be payable to an individual, with the mere suffix of his official character, such suffix will be regarded as mere descriptio personæ, and the individual is the payee." This is universally admitted with relation to such words as "agent," "president," and "executor." As to the title "cashier," commercial usage has so altered the rule that the bank may sue thereon, and its possession of the note will, alone, be sufficient evidence of title. Id. § 1189. For some reason that to us does not seem quite clear, the authorities are not altogether in harmony as to the effect when the word "trustee" is added to the payee's name. The use of the suffix "agent," or "executor," indicates, as well as the word "trustee," that some person other than the named payee is equitably interested in the proceeds of the note. So this reason is not sufficient for holding that negotiability is destroyed, and no other has been advanced or occurs to us. In a well-considered case the court of chancery appeals of Tennessee, after noting the conflict of authority, thus concludes: "We take it that the decided weight of authority, and, it seems to us, of sound reason, supports the position that the addition of the word 'trustee' to the name of the payee of a note does not destroy its negotiability." Fox v. Citizens' Bank & T. Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 35 L. R. A. 678, 37 S. W. 1102. See also Bush v. Peckard, 3 Harr. (Del.) 385; Downer v. Read, 17 Minn. 493 (Gil. 470); Binney v. Plumley, 5 Vt. 500, 26 Am. Dec. 313; Pierce v. Robie, 39 Me. 205, 63 Am. Dec. 614. We are quite content to follow these holdings. The case of Gordon v. Anderson, 83 Iowa, 224, 12 L. R. A. 483, 49 N. W. 86, cited and relied upon by appellant, is not in conflict with this principle. In that case the note was made payable to "Chas. R. Whitesell et al." The payee there was undoubtedly rendered uncertain, for by its terms the legal title to the note was vested in others, unnamed, jointly with Whitesell.

2. This instrument was, for the reasons given, negotiable. The undisputed evidence shows that it was purchased by plaintiff bank in the usual course of business, before due, without notice of any infirmity, and that full value was paid therefor. It was shown that the bank made some inquiry as to the paper before purchasing. The claim is made that, had it inquired further, it would have learned that the note was obtained by fraud, and was without consideration. Without saying that the evidence does not show the bank to have been diligent in this respect, the rule is that mere negligence on the part of the purchaser is not sufficient to charge him with notice. Lehman v. Press, 106 Iowa, 389, 76 N. W. 818, and cases cited.

The uncontradicted evidence thus showing that plaintiff was a bona fide holder, the defenses offered could not be urged against it. The trial court would have been justified at the close of the testimony in ordering a verdict for plaintiff. This being true, we need not consider the many criticisms of the charge of the trial court; for the errors committed, if any, were without prejudice.

Affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Kansas ex rel. A. A. GODARD,

v.

W. A. JOHNSON et al., Judges and Officers of the Court of Visitation.

(61 Kan. 803.)

*Chapter 28 of the Laws of the Special Session of 1898, entitled "An Act Creating a Court of Visitation, Declaring Its Jurisdiction and Powers, and Providing for Proceedings and Procedure Therein," is unconstitutional and void for the reason that, in the powers conferred upon that tribunal, legislative, judicial, and administrative functions are commingled and interwoven together in a manner violative of the constitutional requirement that the three great departments of government shall be kept separate, and the powers and duties of each exercised independently of the others.

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to assume jurisdiction of a petition praying them to determine what are reasonable rates for the shipment of cattle between certain points within the state. Denied.

Statement by Smith, J.:

On the 8th day of February, 1900, the state solicitor filed with the clerk of the court of visitation an information, based on the affidavit of J. W. Robison, praying said court of visitation to inquire into and find what are reasonable rates or charges for the shipment of cattle in this state between the several stations on the lines of road operated by the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fé Railway Company, and especially between Eldorado, Kansas, and Kansas City, Kansas; that a complete schedule of such rates or charges be made; and that said company be enjoined from demanding, charging, or receiving any other or different rates or charges. The material part of said information is as follows: "That said the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fé Railway Company is a railroad corporation incorporated and organized under the laws of the state of Kansas, and is, and for several years last past has been, engaged as a common carrier in operating certain lines of railroad in said state, carrying freight and live stock, between numerous points and stations therein, including the haul from Eldorado, Kansas, to Kansas City, Kansas. That said complainant, J. W. Robison, is a citizen and resident of said state, and is an extensive shipper of cattle, and has frequent occasion to make use of the facilities afforded for shipment over said railroad; and many other citizens and residents of this state are, and for a long time have been, engaged in the business of feeding and shipping cattle, and are interested, in common with said complainant, in the rates charged by the railroads, including the lines of road operated by said the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fé Railway Company, for such shipments. That previous to December 1, 1899, said railway company charged for the shipment of cattle a certain rate per car load, which rate, as it concerned and affected said complainant, was thirty-six and 20-100 ($36.20) dollars per car, 36 feet in length, from Eldorado to Kansas City, Kansas, and that such rate or charge gave to said company a fair and reasonable compensation for the services performed. That, in disregard of the rights of said complainant and other shippers of cattle, said company on or about December 1, 1899, put in and promulgated a new and greatly increased rate for all such shipments of cattle, and asked and demanded therefor a charge that was and is unreasonable and unjust, and greatly in excess of what a reasonable charge should be for such service. That the new rate or charge is partially based upon weight, but is skillfully devised so as, as far as possible, to conceal the purpose to increase rates. That, in the practical use and application of such new rate, said company now exacts for a shipment of a car of cattle from Eldorado to Kansas City, Kansas, about forty-two ($42.00) dollars per car, as against the charge of thirty-six and 20-100 ($36.20) dollars per car made prior to December 1, 1899. That a correspondingly increased rate has been put in force and is charged between all other stations on the line of the road of said company in this state. That such increase has been made, and such unjust and unreasonable rates are being demanded and exacted from the shippers of cattle in this state, without any legal excuse, and without any regard to what is a reasonable charge for such services." Upon such information being filed with the clerk, and brought to the attention of the judges of the court of visitation, said clerk refused to issue a citation to the railway company, and the judges thereof declined and refused to make an order directing the clerk to issue the same, on the ground and for the reason that the information did not present a case for consideration and adjudication by said court of visitation as to any particular charges or rates paid to or demanded by said railway company, nor present a case which called for an exercise of the judicial powers of said court, but that the matters alleged in said information called for the exercise of powers which were purely legislative or administrative in their nature,—the court being asked merely to determine and fix a schedule of charges which should regulate the rates or charges which might be exacted or demanded by said railway company in future,—and were such powers as the court believed it could not exercise. The attorney general has filed a petition in this court, setting out the matters contained above, and praying that a writ of mandamus issue to the clerk and judges of said court of visitation, commanding them to assume jurisdiction of, and to hear and determine, the case presented by said information.

The law creating the court of visitation is chapter 28 of the Laws of 1898 (Gen. Stat. 1899, §§ 5779-5820), entitled "An Act Creating a Court of Visitation, Declaring Its Jurisdiction and Powers, and Providing for Proceedings and Procedure Therein."

Section 1 creates a court of record, with a seal, to be known as a "court of visitation," consisting of a chief judge and two associate judges, and provides for their qualifications.

Section 5 requires the appointment by the governor of a state solicitor, and that "it shall be his duty to appear and represent the state in all actions and proceedings before the court of visitation to which the state is a party."

The act further provides:

"Sec. 7. The court shall sit at its rooms in the state-house but may for good cause sit in any other place in the state, and shall be deemed in perpetual session for the transaction of business.

"Sec. 8. The court of visitation shall have power and jurisdiction throughout the state:

(1) To try and determine all questions as to what are reasonable freight-rates, switching and demurrage charges, and other charges connected with the transportation of property between points in this state.
(2) To apportion charges between connecting roads, and determine all questions relating to charges for the use of cars and equipments; and to regulate the charges for part car-load and mixed car-load lots of freight, including live stock. (3) To classify freight. (4) To apportion transportation charges among connecting carriers. (5) To require the construction and maintenance of depots, switches, side-tracks, stockyards, cars and other facilities for the public convenience. (6) To compel reasonable and impartial train and car service for all patrons of the railroad. (7) To regulate crossings, and intersections of railroads and regulate the operation of trains over them. (8) To prescribe rules concerning the movements of trains, to secure the safety of employees and the public. (9) To require the use of approved appliances and methods, to avoid accidents and injuries to persons. (10) To restrict railroad corporations to operations within their charter powers, prevent the oppressive exercise thereof, and compel the performance of all duties required of railroads by law. (11) To summon juries, as a court of equity, in any case or matter before it; such juries to be selected as may be directed by rule. Jurors to possess the qualifications, except as to locality, required by law for jurors in the district courts. (12) Such other and further powers as are given by this act or may be conferred by law."

Section 9 provides that, in all matters within its jurisdiction, said court shall possess full common-law and equity powers. It may issue appropriate writs and process to compel the attendance of parties and witnesses, may issue writs of injunction and mandamus, and appoint receivers to carry its judgments into effect, and shall have the same power to punish for contempt as district courts now have, and may exercise it in the same manner, and cause the attendance of a jury whenever required in the exercise of such power.

By § 10 the court has power to establish rules for its government and for the regulation of practice therein, and it is authorized to appoint masters, referees, or receivers in causes before it. It may make rules regarding the framing and filing of the proceeding, and the entering and promulgating of orders and decrees, and generally regulate the practice to be used in said court where special provision is not made or special procedure prescribed.

Section 11 makes it the duty of the sheriff to whom any process of said court shall be directed or delivered to serve and execute the same without delay, and gives the court the same power over such officers as the district court has over sheriffs.

Section 12 confers upon the court power to appoint a marshal to serve processes, and also to appoint a bailiff.

Section 13 relates to pleadings and amendments thereto.

Sections 14, 15, 24, and 25 read:

"Sec. 14. Whenever a complaint on oath shall be presented to the state solicitor, charging that any railroad company demands or collects unreasonable charges, discriminate for or against any shipper, violates any provision of law, or fails or refuses to perform any duty, or stating a valid ground of complaint for any other cause over which the court has jurisdiction, it shall be the duty of said solicitor to forthwith file an information in the name of the state, charging the matters set forth in the complaint.

"Sec. 15. Proceedings in said court shall be instituted by the filing of an information in the name of the state. Upon the filing of the information, the clerk shall at once issue a citation to the defendant and deliver or mail it to the sheriff of the county where it is to be served. The citation shall be accompanied by a certified copy of the information. The sheriff receiving such citation and copy shall without delay serve the same, in the same manner as a summons in a civil action in the district court is served, and shall make due return of service thereon, taxing thereon his lawful fees as for serving a summons, which return shall be made by delivering or mailing to the clerk. The citation shall require the defendant to answer the information within twenty days from the day of service. Reply, if any, shall be filed within twenty-five days from the day of service as shown by the return. At the expiration of twenty-five days from the date of service of the citation, as shown by the return, the clerk shall, whether an answer has been filed or not, enter the case on the trial docket for the first Monday of the next succeeding month, and it shall be thereafter subject to call for trial or disposition in its order on the docket; but because of its superior public importance, or other sufficient reason, the court may advance any case to hearing and determination out of its order on the trial docket."

"Sec. 24. If, upon the hearing of an information alleging the unreasonableness of any railroad company's rate for the transportation of any article or schedule of articles between given points on its line within the state, the court shall deem it probably unjust that such rate or schedule alone should be changed without changing or revising the entire schedule as to such articles over the entire line of such company, the court may order the information to be amended so as to bring such entire schedule before it for consideration; and shall order the said company to answer such amended information, and shall as soon as may be proceed thereon, saving all testimony already taken or adduced.

"Sec. 25. When the court proceeds for the first time to determine what is a reasonable charge for the given service under consideration, the burden of proof shall rest on the railroad company to show what is a reasonable charge. On all subsequent proceedings to change or modify any charge, the burden of proof shall rest on the party moving to change or modify to show that the charge, allowed by the prior decree of the court is unreasonable."

Section 26 provides that no schedule of rates or special contract or agreement proposed mulgated or entered into by any railroad shall be receivable in evidence on behalf of such company as proof tending to show what is a reasonable charge for any services; and the fact that any railroad company has been accustomed to demand or receive any given rate of compensation shall not be received as evidence of the reasonableness of such charge.

Sections 28 and 32 read:

"Sec. 28. Upon the conclusion of every trial, the court shall without unnecessary delay proceed to enter such decree as the pleadings and proofs warrant. After the trial of any action involving the reasonableness of a general schedule of freight charges on any line of road, the court shall find specially such facts as its deems most material. It may find the value of the line of road and of all property used in connection therewith, either separately or in gross, the actual cost thereof, the amount of the capital stock, bonded and other indebtedness of the company, what, if any, part thereof is fictitious or fraudulent, the average yearly revenues of the company and the sources from which they are derived, whether its revenues will probably increase or diminish, the average expenses of operation and maintenance and the purposes to which they are devoted, what, if any, unreasonable or unlawful uses are made of the funds of the company, as well as other matters deemed of special importance; but the failure of the court to make such findings, or any of them, shall not be ground for reversal of its decree. It shall find generally as to the reasonableness of the charges at issue, and may at its discretion find specially as to particular items. The court shall thereupon enter a decree in accordance with its findings and decision, adjudging and decreeing what are reasonable rates for each and every charge and service at issue in the case, and perpetually enjoining the defendant from demanding, charging, or receiving any other or different rates or charges than such as are by the decree determined to be reasonable. The decree shall embody a complete schedule of the charges adjudged to be reasonable, and the classification of freight applicable to and necessary for the explanation thereof."

"Sec. 32. If, after the promulgation of any order or decree of said court, any railroad company bound thereby shall refuse, or for thirty days shall neglect, to comply with or obey, in good faith, such order or decree, the court may, upon application made on three days' notice to said railroad company, and proof of such neglect or refusal, order sequestration of the whole or any part of said company's property, owned or leased, and appoint a receiver or receivers to forthwith take possession and charge of said property or designated part of said property and operate the same and carry such order or decree into effect; and property so taken shall be operated by such receiver or receivers, who shall receive all income therefrom, until such company shall furnish security to the satisfaction of said court for its full and faithful obedience to and compliance with said order or decree; whereupon the accounts of such receiver or receivers shall be passed, and the net proceeds of operating said property shall be paid to said company and the property returned to it."

Section 34 provides for a review by the supreme court of final decrees of the court of visitation, in like manner as judgments of district courts may be reviewed, with power to stay the issuing of any writ or process; such stay not to affect the use, conclusiveness, or exclusiveness of any such decree as evidence in any case or proceeding; no stay to be allowed unless the proceedings in error shall be commenced within sixty days after the promulgation of the decree.

Messrs. A. A. Godard, Attorney General, and J. S. West, for plaintiff:

In Kansas the jurisdiction of any inferior court, save such inherent power and jurisdiction as it may possess by reason of being a court, must be conferred by statute.

The court is a tribunal "clothed with judicial authority, and acting in a judicial capacity."

Parts of a statute repugnant to constitutional provisions do not nullify the whole of the act of which they are a part, if they can be so separated from the remainder as to leave a complete and intelligible whole.

Re Hendricks, 60 Kan. 805, 57 Pac. 965.

Courts of chancery have for centuries required the performance of many acts which might well have been required by the legislature, but still they are courts.

When we speak of the separation of the three great departments of government, and maintain that that separation is indispensable to public liberty, we are to understand this maxim in a limited sense. It is not meant to affirm that they must be kept wholly and entirely separate and distinct, and have no common link of connection or dependence, the one upon the other, in the slightest degree.

Messrs. A. J. Myatt, Robert Dunlap, Allen & Allen, E. D. Kenna, and A. A. Hurd for defendants.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Constitution of this state, like the Constitution of the United States, has created three departments of government,—the executive, legislative, and judicial:

"Art. 1, § 1. The executive department shall consist of a governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, auditor, treasurer, attorney general and superintendent of public instruction. . . ."

"Art. 2, § 1. The legislative power of this state shall be vested in a house of representatives and senate."

"Art. 3, § 1. The judicial power of this state shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts inferior to the supreme court as may be provided by law. . . ."

The framers of the Constitution of the United States were influenced by the doctrine of Montesquieu, then in the height of its influence, that the powers essential to governments should be distributed among three separate bodies of magistrates, viz., legislative, executive, and judicial. Madison, in No. 47 of the Federalist, p. 375, affirmed that such doctrine was recognized by the convention as the foundation of its labors. Montesquieu wrote: "There can be no liberty . . . if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers. . . . Were the power of judging joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would then be the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor." It will be noticed that there is no express provision in the Kansas Constitution to the effect that persons charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to the one shall not exercise any functions pertaining to either of the others. Yet this court, in the case of Re Sims, 54 Kan. 1, 25 L. R. A. 110, 37 Pac. 135, has said: "We think, however, that in our Constitution these powers are as clearly separated as though the framers of the Constitution had said so in terms." Mr. Chief Justice Kingman emphasizes this by saying that to confer both executive and judicial powers upon a court is "as dangerous to good government as it is subversive of the Constitution, which has carefully kept separate the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the government, 'to the end that this may be a government of laws, and not of men.'" Auditor of State v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 6 Kan. 505, 7 Am. Rep. 575. In another place he says that it is absurd to claim that it is in the power of the legislature to give a court authority to review acts which are purely executive in their character. In Coleman v. Newby, 7 Kan. 86, Mr. Justice Valentine discusses the separation of the sovereign powers, and insists that they must be independently maintained, and power exercised only by the particular department to which it has been delegated. He held that the power to make rules for the district court could not be conferred upon the supreme court, for the reason that it was a legislative function, which belonged to the legislature, and could not be exercised by the judicial department. He states that the prescribing of rules by which human conduct shall be governed in the future is a legislative power, and that "to declare what the law is or was belongs to the judiciary, but to declare what it shall be in the future belongs to the legislature." If the making of rules by the supreme court for one of the inferior courts violates the constitutional limitation, certainly the making of general rules and a schedule of rates governing the future conduct of persons and corporations cannot be conferred on a court or judicial tribunal. Again, in Re Davis, 58 Kan. 368-372, 49 Pac. 161, Allen, J., says: "It is not asserted that the Constitution does not make a valid and effectual division of the powers of government into executive, legislative, and judicial departments, nor is the wisdom of such a division of powers questioned, nor has there been any suggestion in the brief or on oral argument that such a division is unreasonable or illogical. It has been generally, if not universally, accepted as the best and safest division of powers yet devised by man, and is recognized as firmly established by all writers on the Constitution. . . . The legislature enacts general rules for the guidance of all departments of the government. It levies taxes, and directs the expenditures of the money raised thereby, but it executes no law. The judiciary declares the law, and directs as to its application to controversies that arise. . . . The fundamental law embodied in the Constitution binds all departments of the government, and fixes the limit of their powers. To its mandates all must yield obedience, for it is superior to any and all agencies created under it." All writers upon constitutional law are agreed that the functions of the three departments should be kept as distinct and separate as possible, except so far as the action of one is made to constitute a restraint upon the action of the other, to keep them within proper bounds, and to prevent hasty and improvident action. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 46. Keeping in view that the separation of powers named must be maintained, it will be well to refer to several sections of the act creating a court of visitation, which fix its jurisdiction and authority, to ascertain what species of power is conferred upon that tribunal:

The first paragraph of § 8 gives authority "to try and determine all questions as to what are reasonable freight rates, switching and demurrage charges, and other charges connected with the transportation of property between points in the state." This, together with other sections, as we shall see, is a grant of judicial power to the court to determine what are reasonable freight rates for services already rendered; but as to what shall be charged in the future for such services it is legislative in character. "(2) To apportion charges between connecting roads, and determine all questions relating to charges for the use of cars and equipment; and to regulate the charges for part car-load and mixed car-load lots of freight, including live stock." This also combines both legislative and judicial powers, dependent on the manner the power is exercised. "(3) To classify freight." This is an administrative function. "(4) To apportion transportation charges among connecting carriers." This is subject to the criticism in respect to the first and second clauses. "(5) To require the construction and maintenance of depots, switches, sidetracks, stockyards, cars and other facilities for the public convenience." This is administrative and legislative. "(7) To regulate crossings and intersections of railroads and regulate the operation of trains over them." This is administrative, and authorizes the court to make rules and regulations to govern the parties affected. It is thus, in a sense, the exercise of legislative power." "(8) To prescribe rules concerning the movement of trains to secure the safety of employees and the public." This is, in a manner, a legislative power, as the rules established become the rules governing the railway corporation. "(9) To require the use of improved appliances and methods to avoid accidents and injuries to persons." As this gives power to prescribe the appliances and regulate their use, it may be said to be legislative and administrative. Powers manifestly not judicial are conferred by § 28, wherein the duty is imposed on the court to enter a decree, without unnecessary delay, after the trial of an action, involving a general schedule of freight rates, and it authorizes the court to find specially such facts as it deems most material. The court shall thereon enter a decree in accordance with its findings and decisions adjudging and decreeing what are reasonable rates for each and every charge and service in the case, and perpetually enjoining the defendant from demanding or receiving any other or different rates or charges than such as are by the decree determined to be reasonable. It is provided that the decree shall embody a complete schedule of the charges adjudged to be reasonable, and a classification of freight applicable to and necessary for the examination thereof. The nature of the power vested in the court by this section will be referred to hereafter.

Legislative power to prescribe rates which railway corporations may charge for carrying freight or passengers exists, beyond question, and its exercise has been uniformly upheld by the courts. And this power the law-makers may delegate to boards or commissions, which has been frequently done. Stone v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191. The extent of the power is curtailed only by limitations placed upon it by the courts in the application of certain constitutional guaranties prohibiting the destruction of property rights vested in the owners of the railway. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 462, 702. The court of visitation is endowed with complete common-law and equity powers, lavishly conferred. It has three judges, a clerk, a seal, and a marshal. It may summon juries, issue writs of mandamus and injunction, punish for contempt, appoint receivers, referees, and masters; and full power is granted to carry its decrees into effect. The attorneys for the state, the complainant, the court of visitation, and the railway company unitedly agree that the court of visitation is a judicial tribunal, and that the powers conferred upon it are in large part purely judicial. Being a court, the vital question decisive of the constitutionality of the law creating it is whether such tribunal has been endowed with legislative powers to an extent destructive of that separation of governmental functions ordained by the 49 L. R. A.

Constitution. In treating the propositions involved, there is no room for originality. We shall travel the beaten path of precedent to a conclusion, leaving to those who dispute the authority to which we adhere, and which we reannounce, the task of breaking away from settled principles, and to blaze new roads through fields of innovation, regardless of those constitutional rules of safety adopted and handed down by our forefathers, the established result of wisdom and experience. In Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362-397, 38 L. ed. 1014, 1023, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1054, Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, said: "It is doubtless true, as a general proposition, that the formation of a tariff of charges for the transportation by a common carrier of persons or property is a legislative or an administrative, rather than a judicial, function. . . . The courts are not authorized to revise or change the body of rates imposed by a legislature or a commission. They do not determine whether one rate is preferable to another, or what under all circumstances would be fair and reasonable as between the carriers and the shippers; they do not engage in any mere administrative work; but still there can be no doubt of their power and duty to inquire whether a body of rates prescribed by a legislature or a commission is unjust and unreasonable, and such as to work a practical destruction to rights of property, and, if found so to be, to restrain its operation." Again, in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 167 U. S. 479-499, 42 L. ed. 253, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900, it is said: "It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable,—that is a judicial act,—but an entirely different thing to prescribe rates which shall be charged in the future,—that is a legislative act." In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Alabama Midland R. Co. 168 U. S. 144-162, 42 L. ed. 421, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 47, Mr. Justice Shiras, speaking for the court, said: "Discussion of those assignments is rendered unnecessary by the recent decisions of this court, wherein it has been held, after elaborate argument, that Congress has not conferred upon the interstate commerce commission the legislative power of prescribing rates, either maximum or minimum or absolute, and that, as it did not give the express power to the commission, it did not intend to secure the same result indirectly, by empowering that tribunal, after having determined what, in reference to the past, were reasonable and just rates, to obtain from the courts a peremptory order that in the future the railroad companies should follow the rates thus determined to have been in the past reasonable and just." In a late case decided by the supreme court of Nebraska (Nebraska Teleph. Co. v. State ex rel. Yeiser, 55 Neb. 627, 45 L. R. A. 113, 76 N. W. 171) it was expressly held that the jurisdiction to determine what compensation a public-service corporation may exact for services to be rendered by it is a legislative, and not a judicial, function. The opinion in the case of Norfolk Street R. Co.'s Appeal, 69 Conn. 576-597, 39 L. R. A. 794, 37 Atl. 1087, and 38 Atl. 708, is an able and well-considered argument of the questions involved here. The incapacity of the legislature to execute a power which is essentially judicial, and the judiciary to execute a power which is essentially legislative, is discussed with great clearness and force. On the question now under consideration it is said: "The regulation of such charges is held to be distinctively a legislative function, which may be delegated by the legislature to a subordinate legislative or administrative body, but if this subordinate body or the legislature exceeds its powers, and a person is thereby injured in his rights of property, he may invoke the judicial power to determine that question of legal injury; and the reasonableness of the charges, although a question legislative in its nature, must be reviewed by the court, as necessarily incident to the exercise of its judicial power. But, if the court should attempt to establish for the future a schedule of charges, it would exceed the limits of judicial power; it would act as legislator in respect to a matter as to which it must also act as judge." Foster, J., in the case of Cotting v. Kansas City Stock-Yards Co. 82 Fed. Rep. 845, said: "It should not be assumed that courts, in deciding this constitutional question, can undertake to fix rates, but merely to decide whether the rates prescribed by the law are in violation of the complainants' constitutional rights." In the same case Judge Thayer, p. 856, used the following language: "The judiciary have no power to prescribe a schedule of maximum rates." In the Express Cases, 117 U. S. 1-29, sub nom. Memphis & L. R. Co. v. Southern Exp. Co. 29 L. ed. 791-803, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556, 628, the court, in passing upon a decree of the lower court in fixing the terms upon which a railroad and an express company should do business with each other, said: "The regulation of matters of this kind is legislative in its character, and not judicial. To what extent it must come, if it comes at all, from Congress, and to what extent it may come from the states, are questions we do not now undertake to decide; but that it must come, when it does come, from some source of legislative power, we do not doubt." In Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339, 36 L. ed. 176, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 400, it is stated that the right to fix rates is a legislative one.

We start, then, in considering the boundaries of judicial and legislative power under our Constitution and system of government, from a fixed monument, to determine whether the legislative power to make rates may be conferred upon the judicial tribunal known as the "Court of Visitation." The rate-making power, being essentially legislative in its nature, whether exercised directly by the legislature, or delegated by it to a competent board or commission, can no more be imposed on or exercised by the judicial department than can the pardoning power of the governor, or any other distinctively executive function. It is a cardinal principle of representative government that the making of laws and rules regulating the future conduct and fixing the rights of parties belongs to the legislative department,—a power which can never be reposed in or exercised by the judiciary. Some of the legislative powers, as before stated, may be delegated to municipal boards and local commissions, but what is called the "power to enact laws" cannot be delegated. But, whether these functions are such as may be delegated or not, they are wholly incompatible with judicial powers, and can never be conferred on, or exercised by, the judicial department. While the line of division between the three powers is not marked distinctly, and it is not always easy to lay down an abstract rule defining each of the separate powers of sovereignty, all courts and all authority unite in holding that the rate-making power is intrinsically legislative. In exercising such power, whether by the legislature or by a commission, general rules prescribing the duties, fixing the rights, and regulating the conduct of persons and corporations in the future are made, and the combining of such a power with those essentially judicial, or vesting it in a court, is a palpable and flagrant violation of the constitutional principle and limitation regulating the separation of the sovereign powers. Gov. Leedy, in calling the special session which enacted the law, and in recommending the kind of legislation respecting freight rates deemed by him to be necessary, said the courts had decided "that the question as to whether an existing rate is reasonable is a judicial question, and that the question as to what rate shall be collectible in the future is a legislative question." We know that some powers are exercised, and may properly be exercised, by one department, that are not strictly its own; but these are such as are expressly authorized by the Constitution, or as are necessary to its independence, or incidental to the execution of its essential powers. For instance, the courts appoint clerks, referees, receivers, masters in chancery, etc.,—a power in its nature executive; and they also frame rules governing the transaction of their business in the future, which partakes of the legislative character. The executive entertains and decides applications for pardons, hears and determines matters incidental to the exercise of an intrinsic executive function, and such hearing and decision by him take on something of the judicial nature. The legislature appoints its officers, punishes for contempt, and these, as well as some other acts, partake of the executive and judicial character. However, these exceptional functions are either themselves expressly provided for in the Constitution or only incidental to the essential sovereign power confided to each department, and most of the functions named are necessary to the independence of such powers. Along this line are a few acts which occupy an intermediate space between the departments, not easily defined nor distinctive in character, and which may be performed by one department without trenching upon the main and essential functions of the other. Some instances of the exceptional acts and powers referred to were cited by Mr. Justice Johnston in Re Sims, 54 Kan. 1, 25 L. R. A. 110, 37 Pac. 135, but conferring upon a single tribunal powers intrinsically judicial, intrinsically executive, and intrinsically legislative has never been sanctioned by any court, nor supported by any writer on the Constitution.

This act undertakes to give the court of visitation authority to act as legislator and judge in the same matter; to prescribe for the future regulation, government, and control of corporations, persons, and property; sit in judgment on its own rules, regulations, and laws; render judgments between parties; impose penalties to the extent of imprisonment, for any adjudged violations; and accompanying these powers so conferred are numerous and important functions which are essentially executive. The case of Re Sims, supra, involved the unwarranted combination of executive and judicial powers. It was held that a county attorney, although closely connected with courts, was an officer whose duties were mainly executive, and that the giving of judicial functions to aid him in the discharge of his executive duties conflicted with our theory of government, and constituted a breaking down of constitutional barriers devised to prevent tyranny and despotism. So jealously has this court guarded and upheld this principle of the separation of sovereign powers, that it recently decided that judicial powers cannot be reposed in a notary public, and that an act of the legislature expressly conferring upon a notary the judicial power to compel a witness to appear and testify in obedience to a subpoena was unconstitutional and void. Notaries public are authorized to subpoena witnesses and take depositions, and although the power of compelling the attendance of witnesses and the giving of testimony is, in a certain sense, incidental to the taking of depositions, the court overruled earlier cases, and held it to be an unconstitutional combining of executive and judicial powers. Re Huron, 58 Kan. 152, 36 L. R. A. 822, 48 Pac. 574. The Price-Raid commission, made up of executive officers of the state, was given authority to hear and determine what was due on certain claims, and it was held that the power exercised by it was not so far judicial in character that the supreme court could take cognizance of an appeal provided for in the statute. Wilson v. Price-Raid Auditing Commission, 31 Kan. 257, 1 Pac. 587. In Re Sims, 54 Kan. 1-4, 25 L. R. A. 111, 37 Pac. 135, Mr. Justice Allen, speaking for the court, said: "The single question presented for our consideration is whether that portion of the statute which authorizes the county attorney to punish as for contempt is in violation of the Constitution of this state. Nothing is more firmly fixed in the governmental systems of all English-speaking countries than the division of powers between the three great departments of government,—the executive, legislative, and judicial. The question before us is whether the legislature has power to confer on an executive officer charged with the duty of searching out violations of the law, inquiring into facts, instituting and carrying on prosecutions for violations of the criminal laws of the state, the power, at the same time, and as ancillary to the performance of his duties as a prosecuting officer, to commit persons to jail as for a contempt of his authority. . . . It is sought to distinguish the case before us from those cited because of provisions in the Constitutions of Wisconsin and Indiana with reference to the separation of executive and judicial powers. We think, however, that in our Constitution these powers are as clearly separated as though the framers of the Constitution had said so in terms. It needs but a suggestion to show that the combination of executive and judicial powers may become tyranny at once. The advancement in the science of government made in modern times is due to the separation of the three great co-ordinate departments. If the legislature may confer on the county attorney one of the highest and most distinctive attributes of judicial power,—that of punishing for contempt,—to aid him in ascertaining from witnesses the facts with reference to violations of law, might the legislature not also confer on any attorney the power to examine witnesses in civil cases in the same manner, and to commit them for contempt if they refuse to answer his questions? Might it not also give to any executive officer, from the governor down, the power to subpoena witnesses to inform his judgment, and to aid him in any executive decision or determination? And, if the rule is established, can it be doubted that the division between executive and judicial offices will be completely broken down, and all constitutional barriers removed from those forms of oppression which have always attended this combination? . . . This is a commingling and confusing of executive and judicial functions in a manner incompatible with the Constitution, obnoxious to its whole spirit and to the spirit of free institutions, and the act to that extent is void." If the legislature is devoid of power to confer judicial functions upon executive officers, is there not the same lack of power to grant legislative and executive authority to a judicial tribunal? Mr. Justice Allen, in this opinion, does not even suggest that the power conferred upon the county attorney might be lodged in him as incidental to his executive duties or in aid thereof. In the same case Mr. Justice Johnston, in a concurring opinion, said: "No case has been sustained, however, where the new duties conferred upon an officer were incompatible with those already imposed by such office. . . . It is not within the power of the legislature to make a judge an arbiter in his own cause, and to give an attorney for one of two adverse parties the power to determine the controversy is wholly inconsistent with our system of jurisprudence." In Auditor of State v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 6 Kan. 505, 7 Am. Rep. 575, a statute prescribed the manner in which the property of railroads and other corporations should be assessed for the purposes of taxation, and one of the sections provided: "The county clerks of the several counties in which any railroad company now has, or hereafter may have, its track and roadway, or any part thereof, shall constitute a board of appraisers and assessors for the property of said railroad company." Laws 1869, chap. 124, § 2. There was a provision for an appeal to the supreme court from the assessments affixed by said board of appraisers. An appeal taken was dismissed upon the ground that assessment and taxation were legislative powers, and that to confer upon this court the power of review over a decision of said board of appraisers and assessors was an attempt to confer legislative functions upon a judicial body. Referring to the legislative and judicial departments, Kingman, Ch. J., speaking for the court, on page 507, 7 Am. Rep. 578, said: "The two are separate and distinct departments of government, each having its appropriate sphere of action, and each clothed with powers to execute the duties pertaining to its own functions; and when each confines itself within the sphere of its constitutional power there is less danger of that peril pointed out by an eminent jurist when he says in reference to this matter: 'There is an inherent and eternal difficulty in confining power of any kind within its proper limits. This general rule holds eminently true in regard to legislative and judicial bodies.' Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 217."

The power to fix rates and classifications is without doubt conferred upon the court of visitation by the terms of the law under consideration. By § 24, upon the hearing of an information alleging unreasonableness in any rate for the transportation of any article or schedule of articles "between given points" on its line, if the courts shall deem it probably unjust that such rate or schedule alone should be changed without changing or revising the entire schedule as to such articles "over the entire line of the company," the court may order the information to be amended so as to bring such entire schedule before it for consideration, and proceed to hear the complaint. Thereon, under § 28, it is authorized to find generally as to the reasonableness of the charges at issue, and "thereupon enter a decree in accordance with its findings and decisions, adjudging and decreeing what are reasonable rates for each and every charge and service at issue in the case and perpetually enjoining the defendant from demanding, charging, or receiving any other or different rate or charges than such as are by the decree determined to be reasonable. The decree shall embody a complete schedule of the charges adjudged to be reasonable and the classification of freight applicable to and necessary for the explanation thereof." By § 32, after the promulgation of such order or decree, if the railroad company affected shall refuse to obey the same for thirty days, the court may seize the whole or any part of the company's property, and appoint a receiver to take possession and charge of the same, to operate the road, and carry the order or decree into effect. It will be noticed from this that the fixing and adjustment of rates and classification are not necessarily based upon the complaint of the injured shipper. To illustrate: In the case at bar Mr. Robison complained of excessive charges for the shipment of live stock from Eldorado to Kansas City, Kansas, a distance of 200 miles. If the court of visitation had taken up the information of the state solicitor based on this complaint, and deemed it probably unjust that the rate complained of for transportation of stock from Eldorado to Kansas City, Kansas, should be changed, without changing and revising the entire schedule of such freight over the entire line of the company, it could order the information to be amended to bring such entire schedule before it for consideration. Its consideration of the entire schedule is not solely for the purpose of fixing a reasonable rate on stock between the points named over the line of the railway, and of which the shipper complains, but for the more extended purpose of fixing a schedule for such articles over the entire line of the company in Kansas, and when so fixed and promulgated such rates become as effective and binding as they would be between the points mentioned in Mr. Robison's complaint. Thus we have the court of visitation, on its own motion, without complaint from any shipper, bringing before it for change and revision the entire schedule of freight rates over the whole system in Kansas of a great railway company. Whatever characterization may be given of the power exercised in determining what is a reasonable rate for Mr. Robison on his stock from Eldorado to Kansas City, Kansas, it cannot be said that by such process and under such proceeding the decree promulgating a body of rates over all other parts of the road than that existing between the towns named can be other than the exercise of power conferred by the Constitution upon the legislature. The statute under consideration is skillfully constructed to confer legislative power upon the court of visitation to fix rates. This deposit of authority, when exercised, is made to take the form of a decree in chancery; indicating that it is the result of a decision after a contest in court between a plaintiff and defendant. In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 682, 28 L. ed. 297, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, it is said: "A court of chancery is not, any more than is a court of law, clothed with legislative power. It may enforce in its own appropriate way the specific performance of an existing legal obligation arising out of contract, law, or usage, but it cannot create the obligation." This tribunal possesses the extraordinary power of proclaiming in its decrees in a suit, in the name of the state (which is not interested as shipper) against the railroad company, schedules which are made conclusive in the future. And any future controversy which might arise between the shipper and the railroad company has thus been prejudged and determined. Here is found a combination of the legislative and judicial functions,—the legislative power of fixing a schedule of maximum rates in respect to services to be rendered in the future by the railroad company to a private shipper, and the judicial power by which a rule for the first time promulgated by that court as to what shall be reasonable rates, by decree and execution thereof, is enforced upon the railroad company, so that, when a controversy does actually arise between a shipper and a railroad company as to whether a charge for the service performed be reasonable or not, such controversy has been prejudged and settled, not in an action between the parties themselves, but in a proceeding in which the state has undertaken to prejudge and determine this question, and settle the rule of conduct to be binding upon the railroad company as to future controversies with private persons. In the usual process of making laws and providing for their enforcement, there is an interim between their enactment and their execution, affording opportunity for thought and preparation by persons affected. Here no time is lost. When a freight rate is established by this court, it goes forth with judicial sanction of reasonableness stamped upon it, and by a chancery decree a fixed rate is promulgated, and simultaneously its fairness judicially determined. Thus the victim first learns of the existence of law by reading a decree enacting it, in which he is condemned for its infraction. In Nebraska Teleph. Co. v. State ex rel. Yeiser, 55 Neb., on page 637, 76 N. W. 174, the following pertinent language is used: "Fixing the compensation which public-service corporations may charge for services to be rendered by them is legislating. It is lawmaking. The power of the courts is limited to declaring what the law is, and they are precluded by the Constitution from performing legislative functions; and though the courts of the land have from time to time declared laws fixing the compensation which public-service corporations might charge for services to be rendered by them void, because the compensation fixed by the law was unreasonable, in that the enforcement of the statute would confiscate the corporation's property, and thereby deprive it of its property without due process of law, we know of no court which has ever claimed that it had authority to determine what compensation would be a reasonable one for a service to be performed by such corporation."

Counsel for petitioner do not seem to question the rule that the establishment of freight rates is a legislative prerogative. Yet, as we understand them, they contend that this establishment may be accomplished through the decrees of a judicial tribunal in 49 L. R. A.

furtherance of and incidental to granted power to determine what are reasonable rates. In other words, admitting that to decide what is a reasonable rate is a judicial power, they argue that when a court determines this it may proclaim its findings in respect thereto, and this declaration is binding, not only upon parties to the inquiry, but upon all other parties who may thereafter be affected. Conceding that courts cannot legislate, they insist that courts may do that which in legal effect is nothing more nor less than legislation. It is one thing to determine whether a freight rate is reasonable, in a controversy between a shipper and a carrier, and another thing to decide, at the suit of the state or a private party, what shall be charged in the future for such services. A decision made in the first case might be a precedent when a similar controversy subsequently arose; but the promulgation of the first decision, however formally done by a judicial tribunal, could not have the far-reaching effect of a legislative act, for it is peculiarly within the province of the legislature to regulate future conduct. Chief Justice Marshall said: "The legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes the law." Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 253. In Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700-761, sub nom. Central P. R. Co. v. Gallatin, 25 L. ed. 496-516, Mr. Justice Field said: "The distinction between a judicial and a legislative act is well defined. The one determines what the law is, and what the rights of parties are, with reference to transactions already had; the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it." In Norwalk Street R. Co.'s Appeal, 69 Conn. page 594, 39 L. R. A. 800, 37 Atl. 1086, Hamersley, J., uses this language: "One controlling consideration in deciding whether a particular act oversteps the limits of judicial power is the necessary inconsistency of such acts with the independence of the judicial department, and the preservation of its sphere of action distinct from that of the legislative and executive departments. A main purpose of the division of powers between legislature and judicature is to prevent the same magistracy from exercising in respect to the same subject the functions of judge and legislator. This union of functions is a menace to civil liberty, and is forbidden by the Constitution. There is no intrinsic difficulty in recognizing a plain infraction of such prohibition." Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations (page 108), notes the distinction between legislative and judicial power, and says: "The difference between the departments undoubtedly is that the legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes the law." And it is said that that which distinguishes a judicial from a legislative act is that the one is a determination of what the existing law is, in relation to some existing thing already done or happened, while the other is a predetermination of what the law shall be,

for the regulation of all future cases falling under its provisions."

Counsel for the defendants say in their brief: "The great purpose of the act was to create a tribunal for the purpose of determining questions of general interest by judicial methods." The matter of general interest mentioned, as evidenced by the proclamation which called the special session of the legislature together, was the establishment of maximum freight rates over the railways of the state, which, as before stated, the governor informed the senate and house was a legislative question. In Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Myatt, 98 Fed. Rep. 335-354, Hook, J., says: "In the case under consideration it seems clear, not that the members of the court of visitation are representative executive officers of the state, but that they are the direct and active representatives of the legislative department. It would certainly be as inconsistent with our system of jurisprudence to empower them to act judicially in matters whereof they had legislative or administrative cognizance, as it would be to confer judicial powers upon an executive officer." The mayor and council of cities of the first class in this state are granted power to fix the rate of carriage of persons, drayage, and transportation of property other than by railroads within the city. In some cases the mayor and council are invested with judicial power. Bland v. Jackson, 51 Kan. 496, 33 Pac. 295. All ordinances must be reasonable, and whether such ordinances are reasonable is a judicial question, to be determined by the court. Kansas City v. McDonald, 60 Kan. 481, 45 L. R. A. 429, 57 Pac. 123. If such mayor and council could be invested with power to pass an ordinance fixing the maximum rate to be charged by hackmen and draymen within the city, and at the same time judicially determine that rates so prescribed and fixed by such ordinance were reasonable, we would have a case parallel to the one at bar, presenting a confusion and commingling of legislative and judicial power not to be tolerated under a democratic form of government.

Whether certain powers mentioned above, other than judicial, conferred by statute upon the court of visitation, are strictly legislative, administrative, or ministerial, it is unprofitable to inquire. It is enough to say that they are not judicial powers, and when that fact is determined they fall outside of the boundary lines to which the functions of courts extend. In the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Myatt, 98 Fed. Rep. 335-354, the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, by Hook, District Judge, has considered fully the questions presented in the case at bar; and in an able opinion the learned judge, after a review of many authorities, only a part of which we have cited, reached the same conclusion at which we have arrived. Counsel for complainant, Robison, frankly state in their brief that "if the establishing of schedules of charges to be made for services to be performed in the future is classed as purely legislative or administrative in its character, then we concede that the court of visitation, if it is a court, could not be vested with any such power." And they further concede that, where the same act which creates a tribunal also attempts to vest it with these separate and independent powers (and it is evident that the legislature would not have created such a tribunal for the exercise of one class of such powers only) the whole act must fall, because of the invalidity of the inseparable part. The best method for the determination of legislative intent is to confine the search to the law itself. If a statute is unconstitutional in a part which is separable and independent and can be eliminated, courts sometimes lop off the obnoxious provisions, leaving the remainder to stand. Mr. Justice Brewer, in Central Branch Union P. R. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Kan. 453-460, states the rule summed up from the highest authorities as follows: "The legislature never enacts laws upon the supposition that one part of them is in conflict with the Constitution and must fail. It always proceeds upon the supposition that all that it does is within its constitutional power. Hence it never in terms says, that, if one portion of its statute fails, the other portion must also fail, nor that it rests one part upon the supposed validity of another part. It legislates as if all that it attempts to do was within its constitutional power; and when, in pursuance of its constitutional duty, the court ascertains that one part of its legislation conflicts with the Constitution and must fail, the inquiry is not whether the balance of the statute is said by the legislature to depend and rest upon the unconstitutional part, but whether, in the nature of things, and by reason of the evident interdependence of the two, one upon the other, the courts can fairly say that the legislature intended the two to stand together as a single entity, the one dependent upon the other, or the one an inducement or compensation for the other, or the two together making a single compact and harmonious whole; and, whenever that appears, then the unconstitutionality of either invalidates both."

We think that, by the several provisions of the statute under consideration, legislative, judicial, and administrative powers are so inextricably interwoven and bound up together as to render their separation impossible. There is absolute confusion in the law, and obliteration of all dividing lines. One kind of power is fused with and welded upon another. We must therefore hold that said court of visitation is wholly without that authority and jurisdiction which the legislature appears to have intended to confer upon it. We concur in the judgment of the judges of that court in their refusal to act in the matter presented to them, for the reason that rate-making is a legislative and administrative function, incompatible with judicial power. We are not unmindful of the rule which obliges us to uphold legislative acts unless their provisions clearly violate some constitutional requirement, and that a doubt upon that question upholds the law. Where one department of government, however, having functions peculiar to itself, attempts to augment its power or extend its prescribed and legitimate sphere of operations beyond the boundaries marked out by the Constitution, we cannot shrink from the duty of defining those limits and obstructing such encroachment, in a proper case, according to our best understanding, in the light thrown upon the question by statesmen, judges, and lawyers who have considered, spoken, and written upon the subject of constitutional limitations of power. Despotism begins when the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of government cease to be independent of one another, and the tyrant exercises without check the powers of the three united.

The peremptory writ of mandamus will be denied.

Doster, Ch. J., dissenting:

I dissent from the judgment of the majority of the court in this case, and dissent from much that is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice Smith. In expressing my non-concurrence, I do not wish to be understood as affirming beyond all question the validity of the statute called the "Court of Visitation Act," in all its details, nor even in its general scope and design. No particular parts of the act have been assailed, except as subsidiary to its main provisions, and as inclusive in the general whole. Consequently I have not taken the trouble to ascertain whether particular portions of it may not be repugnant to the organic law. This might be the case, and yet the substantive part of the enactment be capable of separation from the remainder, and entirely within constitutional limits. The question whether the act in its essential provisions is violative of the fundamental law must be resolved, in my judgment, in its favor, because of the grave doubts involved in the subject, if for no other reason. I have not undertaken to satisfy myself as to its constitutional validity. It is sufficient for my purposes that reasonable doubts upon the subject exist. That a reasonable doubt as to the repugnance of a statutory enactment to the Constitution of the state determines the decision in favor of the statute is a rule to which the courts make constant reference, and by which they profess to be bound. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 216. Unfortunately the declaration of this rule is often a mere profession, and not an actuality of performance. A judicial decision which requires a lengthy and labored argument to clear away all doubts as to the constitutional validity of a legislative enactment is one which belies all professions of adherence to the rule. If a case of constitutional invalidity is clear and free from doubt, the ordinary mind can be led to a positive conclusion without following to any great length the involved and sinuous ways of legal metaphysics. With much respect to my associates, I think they have succeeded only in involving the law in doubt.

The opposition to the act under consideration is based upon the theory of the distribution of governmental powers into the three classes, called "legislative, judicial, and executive," and the nonassimilation of one with the others. There is no disposition to question such classification of powers, nor the necessity of excluding public officers charged with the execution of one of them from the domain of the others. Without admitting that the court of visitation act produces an interblending of separable powers, I wish to say that in the practical affairs of government there is not and cannot be any such thing as a clearly-defined and complete separation of such powers. There is not and cannot be any such thing as a legislature which wills and ordains, and nothing else; a judiciary which interprets and decides, and nothing else; and an executive which enforces, and nothing else. The metaphysical distinction between the spheres of will, judgment, and action cannot be applied in the domain of political science. In the practical affairs of government, the distinctions between legislator, judge, and executioner are speculative and doctrinal, rather than actual, and the lines of demarcation between them vague and fanciful, rather than real. There are points at which the functions of the one assimilate so closely to the others as to be impossible of detection and separation. The most that can be done is to recognize the theoretical classification made, and preserve in general outline the distinction drawn. "Modern political science has, however, generally discarded this theory [the distribution of governmental powers], both because it is incapable of accurate statement, and because it seems to be impossible to apply it with beneficial results in the formation of any concrete political organization." Goodnow, Comparative Administrative Law, 20. See also Wilson, Congressional Government, 285-306; Stevens, Sources of the Constitution, 47; Von Holst, Const. Hist. 67, 68.

A most striking instance of the interfusion of the separable powers of government was furnished by the act of Congress of 1804, providing for the government of the territory of Louisiana. By § 12 of that act the governor and judges of the territory of Indiana were empowered to enact, promulgate, and administer a code of law for the government of the new territory. The judges were not only authorized to assist in the making of the laws, but were authorized to judicially administer them when made, and were further authorized to perform the executive duty of making appointments to the inferior judicial offices. Nor are the views as above expressed those of political theorists only. They are shared by the courts as well. "The position that a legislature cannot constitutionally perform a judicial act is supported by no authority, nor has it any reason in public policy or convenience. On the other hand, it is contradicted by legislative usage and the highest judicial decisions. It is true, as has been argued by the plaintiffs, the Constitution of Pennsylvania divides the powers of government under three general heads of legislative, executive, and judicial; that it ordains that 'the legislative power of the commonwealth shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives;' that 'the supreme executive power shall be vested in a governor,' and that 'the judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court,' etc. This, however, is only a declaration of the general system or theory of our government, and was never intended to fix exact and impassable limits to each department. There are things necessary to be done in the administration of the government, of a character so mixed and blended, partaking of the elements of all these divisions of power, that we could not know to which to assign it. It could not be exclusively claimed by either." Livingston v. Moore, Baldw. 449, Fed. Cas. No. 8,416. Mr. Justice Johnston, of this court, in his concurring opinion in Re Sims, 54 Kan. 11, 25 L. R. A. 113, 37 Pac. 138, remarked: "I am unable, however, to sustain the position of the petitioner, and hold that the vesting of judicial power in an executive officer, and requiring him to perform both executive and judicial functions, is a sufficient objection to the statute. It is highly important to separate the legislative, judicial, and executive functions, and that the officer of one department should not exercise the functions conferred upon another. Under our system, however, the absolute independence of the departments and the complete separation of the powers is impracticable, and was not intended. 'It is true, with some exceptions, that the legislature cannot exercise judicial or executive power, that the courts cannot exercise legislative or executive power, and that the executive department cannot exercise legislative or judicial power; but it is not true that they are entirely separate from each other, or independent of each other, or that one of them may not in some instances control one of the others.' Martin v. Ingham, 38 Kan. 654, 17 Pac. 162. The governor has been vested with some judicial functions, and the legislature acts judicially when it tries a charge of contempt and adjudges punishment therefor. Ministerial duties have been placed upon courts; and, while scrupulous care should be used to prevent an officer of one department from intruding to any extent upon the duties conferred upon an officer of another department, nothing in our state Constitution, as there is in that of some other states, prevents the vesting of more than one function in a single individual. Illustrations of conferring more than one of these powers upon the same person are numerous. It has been held that a mayor of a city of the second class might, while acting as mayor, exercise the powers of a court, although the statute did not in terms create him a court. Prell v. McDonald, 7 Kan. 426, 12 Am. Rep. 423. Judicial powers have been conferred on county commissioners and coroners, whose duties are mainly ministerial. Probate judges, whose duties are mostly judicial, have had conferred upon them many ministerial duties, and legislation giving such powers has been upheld. Re Johnson, 12 Kan. 102; Intoxicating-Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 758, 37 Am. Rep. 284. Other instances might be cited, but these are sufficient to show that the legislature may confer judicial powers upon an executive officer, provided such duties are not inconsistent with those required of such officer."

Nor is the lodgment of dual and even tripartite governmental powers in a single tribunal lacking in illustration among the decided cases. Indeed, the decisions in which it has been allowed are almost as numerous as those which declare the general theory of distributive powers. In State v. Young, 3 Kan. 445-448, it was held that, under the organic act of the territory of Kansas before its admission as a state, municipal courts for the enforcement of municipal regulations might be created, although by § 27 of such organic act the judicial power of the territory was vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace. A similar ruling was made in People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Provines, 34 Cal. 520. In that case it was held that one holding the judicial office of police judge of the city and county of San Francisco might at the same time hold and perform the executive office of police commissioner of the city and county. The reason for this holding, and also that of State v. Young, 3 Kan. 445, 448, was that the effect of the distributive clauses of the Constitution was confined to the central government, and did not extend to the minor depositaries of power. In Hovey v. State ex rel. Carson, 119 Ind. 395, 21 N. E. 21, it was held that, while appointments were in their nature executive acts, they might nevertheless be exercised by the legislature, as to certain of the managing officers of the charitable institutions. In For v. McDonald, 101 Ala. 51, 21 L. R. A. 529, 13 So. 416, a similar ruling was made. In People ex rel. Longenecker v. Nelson, 133 Ill. 565, 27 N. E. 217, it was held that a power given to the judges of the circuit and county courts to make certain appointments to office might be rightfully exercised. In Callen v. Junction City, 43 Kan. 627, 7 L. R. A. 736, 23 Pac. 652, it was held that the statute which vested in the judge of the district court the power to determine as to the advisability of making additions to the territorial limits of cities was not unconstitutional, as being a delegation of legislative power to a judicial officer. The same decision was made in Huig v. Topeka, 44 Kan. 577, 24 Pac. 1110. In Lynch v. Chase, 55 Kan. 367, 40 Pac. 666, it was held that where the proceedings to remove the incumbent of a public office involved the examination of facts and the exercise of judgment and discretion, and although the power to hear and determine was in that, as in other cases, of a judicial nature, it was not judicial in the sense that it belonged exclusively to the courts, and therefore that it might be conferred upon and exercised by the governor or other proper executive officer.

The books abound in similar decisions. I have selected those above cited at random. I have done so, not upon the supposition of their direct bearing upon the question for decision in this case, but to illustrate the frequency with which the theoretical separability of the powers of government is repudiated, or at least denied application. I grant that these cases do not establish the proposition that powers, both judicial and legislative, were rightfully conferred by the court of visitation act, no more than the cases cited in the majority opinion establish the proposition that the powers conferred by that act were both legislative and judicial, and therefore impossible of constitutional exercise. However, the cases I cite do establish what I think is a vital point in this controversy, namely, that a department of government, in the execution of a power essentially belonging to it, may (indeed, often must) administer some of the incidents of its power in accordance with the forms and methods of the other departments. For instance, as remarked by the supreme court of Massachusetts in considering the nature of the power of city authorities to construct and remove sidewalks: "The power to determine whether public convenience requires the construction of a sidewalk, and equally so its removal, involves the exercise of judgment not administrative only; and the exercise of the power is judicial in its character, although expressed in a legislative form." Att'y. Gen. v. Boston, 142 Mass. 200, 7 N. E. 722. Many of the cases hereafter cited will further illustrate this proposition.

The decision of my associates is based upon the assumption that the power to declare a schedule of railroad traffic charges is a legislative power. I deny that such is true, in the sense in which the claim is made, and in the sense in which it is necessary to make it in order to reach the conclusion at which they have arrived. There is not a single case in the books giving countenance to the claim as made. On the contrary, there is not a case which in terms or in its rationale does not decide or give countenance to a different theory. The power to declare a schedule of railroad rates is legislative only in the sense that the subject-matter of railroad rates is within legislative jurisdiction. The making of the rate itself is not a legislative duty, but, on the contrary, may be committed to an inferior tribunal or body, precisely as was done in the act under consideration. If the making of a schedule of railroad rates is the exercise of a legislative power, it must be, therefore, exercised by the legislature, and cannot be delegated. But it can be delegated. It has been delegated, and legislative acts delegating the power have been in every instance upheld. Stone v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 630, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 1191; Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 38 L. ed. 1014, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047; Atlantic Exp. Co. v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 111 N. C. 463, 18 L. R. A. 393, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 294, 16 S. 40 L. R. A.

E. 393; McWhorter v. Pensacola & A. R. Co. 24 Fla. 417, 2 L. R. A. 504, 5 So. 129; Georgia R. Co. v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694. There are numerous other cases to the like effect, and none to the contrary. There is a difference between the power to make a law, and the power to adopt and enforce rules and regulations to effectuate the policy or accomplish the purposes of the law. The former is legislative, and cannot be delegated. The latter is the subject of constant exercise by inferior tribunals clothed with mixed legislative, judicial, and executive authority. While, therefore, the legislature, by virtue of its general authority over the subject of railroad traffic charges, may make a schedule of rates, the power to do so is not of that essential and inherent legislative character which forbids its exercise by some other tribunal thereunto lawfully authorized. The concrete question now presented to us is, What, of necessity, must be the nature and functions of the tribunal to which the power is delegated? Must the agency be, of necessity, like the principal which created it,—legislative in character and methods,—or may it be judicial in its nature and attributes, or may it be a combination of both? I have yet to hear a reason why the legislature may not employ judicial agencies in the ascertainment of the reasonableness of a schedule of traffic rates. To the unconditional exercise of legislative authority over the subject of transportation charges there is but one limitation. The rates fixed, whether by direct action of the legislature, or by a commission or other tribunal created by it, must be reasonable to the carrier. They must not be so low as to prevent the carrier earning a reasonable income, and thereby amount to a deprivation of property without due process of law. They must not be confiscatory, as it were. This is not only the settled rule, but the just decision of all the courts. The converse of this proposition is equally true, and, so far as judicial enunciation is concerned, is a far older rule. Johnson v. Pensacola & P. R. Co. 16 Fla. 623, 26 Am. Rep. 731; Hutchinson, Carr. 2d ed. § 443. From the earliest time the rule has been that the charges of a common carrier must be reasonable, and from the earliest time the question as to the reasonableness of the carrier's charges has been a judicial one. In the early days, before the business of transportation had assumed the proportions which now exist, and before it came to be conducted by the agencies now employed, the question as to the reasonableness of a carrier's charges was determinable with comparative ease and certainty in the particular cases in which it arose. The problems involved in it were simple. Transportation was carried on by the use of vehicles drawn by animals over the free highways, or for limited distances in small vessels of inexpensive character. The factors of the problem were few in number and easy of comprehension. Conducted as the carriage of goods now is over lines of railway hundreds, perhaps thousands, of miles in length, and requiring thousands of men and millions of money to safely and expeditiously transact it, and vitally affecting as it does every member of the body politic, it is impossible of judicial regulation in the matter of reasonableness of charges through the determination of particular cases as they arise. In the settlement of every rate questioned are involved matters of original cost and continued maintenance, of the competition of rival lines, of distance, of long and short hauls, of expense of train service, of taxation of property, of car accounting with other roads, of classification of goods, of responsibility as warehouseman, of insurance against negligence, and a hundred or more others which in the first instance are only known to and appreciable by the railroad expert. Every one of these matters is involved in the problem of rate-making between any two given points. The determination of the reasonableness of the rate upon live stock, for instance, between the two points mentioned in these proceedings, Eldorado and Kansas City, Kansas, is no less complicated and difficult than is the determination of the reasonableness of a general freight schedule upon all classes of goods from and to all other points. The determination of the one problem as between the two points practically determines the same problem as between all other points. The factors involved are essentially the same. To impose upon a shipper the obligation of determining in his own interests and at his own expense the reasonableness of a freight charge as to any particular shipment of goods, involving as it does the consideration of questions which tax the best brain of the world, and to deny him relief unless he will do it, would be an unspeakable outrage. It is not done any longer. It is not undertaken any more. Thirty-five years have elapsed since the first railroad entered upon Kansas soil. During that time not a single common-law controversy over the reasonableness of railroad charges has reached this court. I doubt whether any have been brought in any of the courts of the state. The common-law rule which allowed them to be brought as particular instances of claimed overcharges occurred, while still in existence, no longer has application according to common-law methods. To refer an aggrieved shipper to the common-law remedy is like holding the word of promise to the ear, and breaking it to the hope. I claim that the common law, while still requiring reasonableness of charges by the carrier, no longer undertakes the adjustment of particular disputes as they arise, but it aggregates such disputes, and settles them in a judicial controversy, to which the public is a party on the one hand, and the carrier a party on the other; that is, I claim that the rule for so doing is in process of evolution through the adjudications of the courts. I grant that no adjudication directly declarative of such rule has been made, but I insist that the logic of every recent decision (and, among the number, all those cited by Mr. Justice Smith) furnishes material for an induction of the rule, and inevitably points to a final generalization as I have endeavored to make it. Either that is true, or the common-law jurisdiction of the courts to determine the reasonableness of railroad traffic charges must be abandoned as no longer tenable. Every decision cited in the majority opinion, and notably those made by the Federal courts, is assertive of the rule that the reasonableness of a carrier's charges, in its last analysis, is for the courts. These decisions have not been made in controversies between shipper and carrier, nor have they been made in controversies as to the reasonableness of a particular charge, but they have been made in controversies in which the carrier was a party on the one hand, and the state a party on the other, and they have been made as to general schedules of traffic rates. Furthermore, they did not adjudicate as to past transactions. They adjudicated as to transactions in futuro. They did not merely determine that as to past transactions or past shipments the rates fixed by legislative enactment of the states or commissions authorized by the states were unreasonably low. They determined that as to future transactions—as to future shipments—the rates so fixed would continue to be unreasonably low so long as the existing circumstances involving the carrier remained the same.

In the case of Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 835, 64 Fed. Rep. 165, it was decided by Mr. Justice Brewer that the traffic rates as fixed by the state of Nebraska were unreasonably low, in view of the then condition of the railroad business in that state, and hence that the further enforcement of the legislative schedule should be enjoined, but that jurisdiction of the injunction proceeding would be retained, to the end that, as future traffic might justify, the injunction order could be modified, and the reinstatement of the statutory schedule of rates be allowed. Upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States [169 U. S. 550, 42 L. ed. 850, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418], it was ruled that, "if the circuit court finds that the present condition of business is such as to admit of the application of the statute to the railroad companies in question without depriving them of just compensation, it will be its duty to discharge the injunction heretofore granted, and to make whatever order is necessary to remove any obstruction placed by the decrees in these cases in the way of the enforcement of the statute." It is idle—it is puerile—to talk about the effect of this and other like decrees operating in præsentia only, and as to past transactions. They project themselves into the future, and were intended to do so. They operate upon things to be apprehended, and prevent their occurrence, the same as do all judgments restrictive of future action. The claimed difference between nullifying a schedule of unreasonably low rates without fixing a reasonable one in its stead, and nullifying a reasonable high one by fixing a reasonable one in its stead, will be further noticed presently. Now, decisions like those above noted have held that schedules of rates fixed by or under legislative authority were and would be, under prevailing conditions, unreasonably low, and they were made in controversies in which the authorized agents of the general public were allowed a standing in court to defend the rates fixed by them. I demand to know by what reason, in the case of a general schedule of rates fixed by the railroad companies themselves, which the public claim are and will continue to be too high under prevailing conditions, that public may not have a standing in court to likewise adjudicate the question. The business of railroad transportation is of vital public concern. It is clothed with a public interest. It is not juris privati. That was decided in the case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, and has been repeated in a multitude of decisions since that one was made. If, in virtue of the private interest which railroad companies have in the maintenance of their right to charge reasonable tolls they can compel the state to litigate with them as to whether the rates fixed by law afford to them less than a fair compensation, and if, in virtue of that right, they can secure an adjudication of prospective application in their favor, upon precisely the same ground, ought the state to be allowed to litigate the public interests of all its citizens against the private interests of the carrier companies in the maintenance of an unreasonably high schedule of rates, and to secure in its favor a like decree of prospective application.

I think the rule of the rightfulness of an interposition by the state to secure a judicial adjudication of the reasonableness of a schedule of railroad rates was broadly intimated by the majority of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 462, 702, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209. That was one among the first of the cases holding that the reasonableness of a state schedule of railroad rates was, in its final aspect, a judicial question for the courts. In the majority opinion, on page 458, 134 U. S., page 981, 33 L. ed., page 220, 3 Inters. Com. Rep., and page 467, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep., Mr. Justice Blatchford says: "The question of the reasonableness of a rate of charge for transportation by a railroad company, involving as it does the element of reasonableness both as regards the company and as regards the public, is eminently a question for judicial investigation, requiring due process of law for its determination." In this case Mr. Justice Miller, in a concurring opinion, laid down what he regarded as ten fundamental legal propositions, as bases of action by the courts in adjudicating controversies between railroad companies and the public over the reasonableness of traffic charges. The third, fourth, sixth, and seventh of these propositions indicate the views which I think ought to be, and finally will be, the controlling ones. They are as follows: "(3) Neither the legislature, nor such commission acting under the authority of the legislature, can establish arbitrarily, and without regard to justice and right, a tariff of rates for such transportation which is so unreasonable as to practically destroy the value of the property of the persons engaged in the carrying business, on the one hand, nor so exorbitant and extravagant as to be in utter disregard of the rights of the public for the use of such transportation, on the other. (4) In either of these classes of cases there is an ultimate remedy by the parties aggrieved, in the courts, for relief against such oppressive legislation, and especially in the courts of the United States, where the tariff of rates established either by the legislature or by the commission is such as to deprive a party of his property without due process of law.

(6) That the proper, if not the only, mode of judicial relief against the tariff of rates established by the legislature or by its commission is by a bill in chancery asserting its unreasonable character, and its conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and asking a decree of court forbidding the corporation from exacting such fare as excessive, or establishing its right to collect the rates as being within the limits of a just compensation for the service rendered. (7) That until this is done it is not competent for each individual having dealings with the carrying corporation, or for the corporation with regard to each individual who demands its services, to raise a contest in the courts over the questions which ought to be settled in this general and conclusive method." The italics in the above quotations are mine. I know it does not well establish the soundness of a legal opinion to rest it upon isolated quotations from the argumentative writings of the judges, and I do not propose to do much in that way. My associates have done quite enough of it in their opinion. However, when a rule of law is in its formative stage, we may well look to such character of expressions, and even to the dicta of the judges, for light and guidance. But we are not left to the chance and casual thought of the courts upon the question for clear indications of the governing rule. Decisions quite clearly indicative of what the rule is, or ought to be, have been made.

An act of Congress approved June 30, 1870, authorized the construction and maintenance of a bridge over the Niagara river by the International Bridge Company, and it provided, among other things, that "all railway companies desiring to use said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage of the same, and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof, and of all the approaches thereto, under and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the district court of the United States for the northern district of New York, upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties, in case they shall not agree." The bridge company and the railroad companies using the bridge could not agree, and the court was called upon, according to the act of Congress, to determine the terms and conditions of equality of right and privilege in the companies to the use of the bridge, and the terms and conditions upon which, as to the bridge company, the railroad companies were entitled to use the structure. The case is so nearly like the one before us, and the decision of the court so nearly sustains the rule we contend for, that I quote the syllabus and a large portion of the opinion: "(1) A determination by a court, under the authority of a statutory enactment, in a case of disagreement, of the 'terms and conditions' upon which a railway company should be entitled to the use of a bridge and its appurtenances, after hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties, is not an improper exercise of the judicial function. (2) It is no less the exercise of a judicial function to prescribe a rule of conduct, or protect the existence of a right during a future period, than it is to determine whether the right has been invaded in the past. (3) When a statute refers the question of the conditions upon which an easement shall be enjoyed to a judicial tribunal for decision, after hearing the proofs and allegations of the parties, the implication is cogent that the decision shall proceed upon settled principles of law and equity, and not upon arbitrary discretion." "By the act in question Congress gave its sanction in advance, but upon the conditions that all railway companies desiring to use the bridge should have equal rights and privileges in the passage and in the use of the bridge, and of the machinery, fixtures, and approaches, 'under and upon such terms and conditions' as this court should prescribe, 'upon hearing the proofs and allegations of the parties, in case they should not agree.' The power of Congress over the subject was plenary. It exercised the power, and the International Bridge Company availed itself of the privileges, and assented to the conditions of the legislative sanction. Congress could not delegate its legislative power to any other authority, nor could it confer jurisdiction upon this court to exercise any but judicial functions: and if the act in question, in any of its provisions, contravenes these maxims of constitutional law as to those provisions, it is inoperative. But the act is not obnoxious to these objections. It devolves upon this court simply the judicial functions of determining the rights of parties when they may be brought into controversy. The rights are created and established by the act, and this is the office of the legislative department. The power to adjudicate upon these rights, to ascertain when controversy arises, their extent and value, and apply the appropriate remedy for their protection, is conferred upon the court; and this is the peculiar province of the judicial department. It is argued that the act attempts to confer upon the court the power to fix the rate of tolls which the International Bridge Company may charge, and that this is a legislative, and not a judicial function. If Congress had fixed the rate of tolls, as it had the right to prescribe the conditions upon which the franchise might be enjoyed, no other authority could have intervened to change these conditions. But suppose the act had, in terms, provided that the bridge company might charge reasonable tolls; would not this have been a complete exercise of the legislative power, and would it not have remained for the judicial department to decide, when controversy should arise, what were or were not reasonable tolls? And, if the act had provided for such a determination by a judicial tribunal, would this have been unconstitutional? It seems to me, clearly not. It is no less the exercise of judicial functions to prescribe a rule of conduct, or protect the existence of a right during a future period, than it is to determine whether the right has been invaded in the past. It is one of the common offices of a court of equity to do this." Canada Northern R. Co. v. International Bridge Co. 7 Fed. Rep. 653.

It is not true, as the above-cited cases and others bearing more or less directly upon the question evidence, that judicial action is confined to things in presenti, and cannot be made determinable of controversies to arise in the future, when the nature of the controversies can be known beforehand, and provision for their settlement can be made in advance; nor is it true that the courts cannot exercise what is called "administrative power." Administrative power, as well as I can define it, when exercised in respect to matters of public interest, is a quasi judicial power of discretionary control to effectuate a rule of legal policy. This definition is not entirely accurate or exact. It will suffice, however, as I believe, to comprehend, in general outline, cases of public concern in which the power called "administrative" is exerted. Such kind of power is in constant use by the equity courts. There is not a power conferred by the court of visitation act but what is of frequent exercise by the courts in railway mortgage foreclosure cases. While no cases of the promulgation of schedules of traffic rates by courts in the foreclosure of railway mortgages have come under my observation, it cannot be doubted, I think, that the judges in such cases have an unquestioned right to make, and through their receivers to enforce, a schedule of rates over the lines subject to their control. They have done what in principle is the same thing. In the case of Waterhouse v. Comer, 19 L. R. A. 403, 55 Fed. Rep. 149, and Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 619, 62 Fed. Rep. 7, it was ruled that the courts had power in railway foreclosure cases to control their receivers as to wages paid the employees operating the lines, and to that end to annul schedules of wages promulgated by the receivers, and at one time approved by the court, and to restore former schedules of wages. In the case of Mercantile Trust Co. v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 49 U. S. App. 462, 81 Fed. Rep. 254, 26 C. C. A. 383, it was said by the United States circuit court of appeals that courts of equity were charged with the performance of some duties that were administrative rather than judicial in their nature; as, for instance, whether the receiver operating a railway under process of mortgage foreclosure should renounce or adopt a contract of lease of another railway which the mortgagor company had made before the foreclosure proceeding began. As to the question involved in the case, the court tersely stated its character as follows: "The issue in the court below presented a question of business policy, and not a question of law. The decision and order of the court were administrative rather than judicial." It is no answer to say that there is a difference between the powers of a court charged with the judicial administration of a trust, as in a foreclosure case, and its powers in other cases over which it has jurisdiction. The obligation of courts to assist in the collection of debts in mortgage foreclosure cases does not justify the exertion of any powers which may not be employed in the interest of litigants in other classes of cases. The law is the same to all suitors alike. It may be admitted that the traditional jurisdiction of courts of equity does not include the power to decree a schedule of traffic rates, except to the specific end of raising revenue from the tolls with which to discharge a creditor's lien; but the legislature, as I contend, may confer jurisdiction upon it to do so for other purposes, or in the interest of other parties. It is said there is a difference between nullifying a schedule of unreasonable rates, and decreeing a schedule of rates to be reasonable. I claim there is no difference. When a court judicially declares that a schedule of traffic rates is unreasonably low, and therefore relieves the company from the obligation to limit its charges thereby, it at the very same time, in effect, at least, decrees another schedule of rates in its stead. It decrees a schedule of reasonable rates. The common law required rates to be reasonable, and, when the court adjudges the legislative schedule to be unreasonable, it does but decree the enforcement of the common-law schedule in its stead. It does not at the time determine what is reasonable. It leaves that to future determination. Heretofore it had been left to ascertainment in isolated and particular cases. That method is no longer practicable, as I think has been hereinbefore shown. No one, as before remarked, undertakes to resort to it, and no court will now pretend that the remedy is practicable or adequate. That the law should afford to railroad companies a remedy in the courts against an unreasonably low schedule of rates, and the right to adjudicate it as a whole, in a single controversy, but at the same time deny to the shipping public the right to abate as a whole and in a single controversy an unreasonably high schedule fixed by the company itself, would be a reproach to the administration of justice, and an outrage upon common right. Whether the power in the courts to adjudicate the question of traffic rates be called "judicial" or "administrative," it exists, in my judgment. I close with the following quotation from a recent and most philosophic and valuable work, entitled "Comparative Administrative Law," by Goodnow: "Although the general rule may be that the courts shall be confined in the main to the decision of controversies between individuals, nevertheless in many instances the needs of government make it seem advisable to intrust the courts with functions somewhat administrative in character. While this may be said of all states, it is especially true of those which have not really striven in their law to reach any clear distinction between judicial and administrative functions. Thus, in the commonwealths of the United States and England, where the exceptions to the logical adoption and application of the theory of the separation of powers are numerous, judicial officers, from time immemorial, have been intrusted with the discharge of executive or administrative functions." Page 29. I think there are no sufficient reasons for annulling the statute as has been done by my associates in their decision.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT

v.

Joseph GREGG, Appt.

(126 N. C. 176.)

1. Assignment for value of a bill of lading made "to order of shipper" transfers title to the property covered thereby as

NOTE.—Rights and liabilities of the assignee of a bill of lading with draft attached as against the consignee, who does not get the goods or who finds them defective.

The decision in the main case is one of very great interest and importance in commercial law, and if followed would undoubtedly cause a revolution in commercial circles. It is to the effect that where an assignee of a draft (which was apparently a negotiable instrument) attached to a bill of lading receives payment of against all the world except the shipper, so that the property can no longer be attached by a third person for the shipper's debts.

2. An assignee of a bill of lading with draft attached will, in case he receives payment of the draft, be subject to action for a return of the money in case the property covered by the bill does not comply with the contract.

3. Subsequent consignments covered by bills of lading with draft attached which had been assigned to the same person the draft without any opportunity being given to the consignee to inspect the goods, he is liable to an action for the return of the money if the goods shipped are afterwards found not to comply with the contract of sale. The statement is made in the opinion that the consignee has the same right of action for damages against the assignee of the bill of lading for the defects in the goods shipped that he would have had against the consignor.

The case is very similar to that of Landa v. Lattin Bros. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 246, 46 S. W.

as a former one, the draft against which was paid, are subject to attachment in his hands for loss because of failure of the former consignment to comply with the contract.

4. An attachment suit may be amended so as to embrace the same cause of action against persons who have intervened to claim the property as was set up against the original defendant.

(March 13, 1900.)

APPEAL by defendant and intervener from a judgment of the Superior Court for Nash County in favor of plaintiffs in an attachment proceeding to recover damages for breach of contract in the sale of certain corn. Affirmed on intervener's appeal; reversed on defendant's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jacob Battle, for appellants:

When the contract of sale is executory, the remedy of the purchaser to recover damages on the ground that the article furnished does not correspond with that contracted for does not survive the retention of the property by the vendee after discovery of defects, unless he notifies the vendor.

Reed v. Randall, 29 N. Y. 358, 86 Am. Dec. 305; Beck v. Sheldon, 48 N. Y. 365; Fairbank Canning Co. v. Metzger, 118 N. Y. 260, 23 N. E. 372.

In executory contracts for sale and delivery of personal property, the purchaser must give notice of any defect in the property delivered, as soon as discovered, if he wishes to hold the seller for such defect.

Sprague v. Blake, 20 Wend. 61; Leavenworth v. Packer, 52 Barb. 132; Maxwell v. Lee, 34 Minn. 511, 27 N. W. 196; Thompson v. Libby, 35 Minn. 446, 29 N. W. 150; Gaylord Mfg. Co. v. Allen, 53 N. Y. 515; Fisher v. Samuda, 1 Campb. 190.

48, cited in the main case, in which a bank cashed a draft drawn upon one to whom the drawer had consigned a shipment of wheat, the bill of lading being attached to the draft. The draft was presented and paid before the consignee had any opportunity to inspect the wheat, which, on examination, was found to be of inferior quality. The court held that the bank, by taking the assignment of the bill of lading, became the owner of the wheat, and responsible for the performance, and affected by the burdens, of the contract for its sale, and that the consignee could recover from it for the breach of warranty as to the quality of the wheat.

There seems to be no question but that the assignee of the bill of lading in these cases succeeded as such, and, leaving the draft out of the question, to the rights of the assignor, and to no greater rights, and that it could not have compelled the consignee to complete the contract of purchase and accept inferior goods any more than the consignor could have done. Columbian Nat. Bank v. White, 65 Mo. App. 677, cited in the main case, is an example of this. In that case a consignee of lumber to be sold on commission discovered, after paying the freight, that the lumber was of inferior quality, and refused to accept a draft for the purchase price attached to the bill of lading, which had been assigned to a bank which made an advance to the consignor on the faith of such bill of lading. And after waiting a reasonable time the consignee sold the lumber to reimburse himself for the freight charges paid. The bank sued him for the full amount of the draft, and the court held that it could not recover as his rights had not been disturbed or impaired by the change of ownership resulting from the assignment, and he had the same defenses as against the bank that he would have had as against the consignor.

If the bank had made the advances solely on the faith of a bill of lading, and no draft had been attached, the result reached in the main case, and in that of Landa v. Lattin Bros. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 246, 46 S. W. 48, supra, may for present purposes be conceded to have been correct, but if so it seems to have been based on a wrong ground. Both cases held that the consignee had the same right of action for damages against the assignee for the defects in the goods shipped that he would have had against the consignor; but it does not seem that the court could have intended the full effect of such a decision, as, for instance, on the amount of damages. The measure of damages against the seller in case of a breach of warranty according to many authorities, would be the difference between the value of the goods if they had been as warranted, and their actual value in their defective condition. Goods which, if they had been as warranted, would, because of special circumstances such as sudden rise in value, or resales at a profit made to the knowledge of the seller, have been worth double the purchase price, may, when inspected, prove to be utterly worthless. The measure of damages against the consignor for the breach of warranty might, in that case, be much more than the consignee had paid. But on what principle can an assignee making a bona fide advancement on the faith of a bill of lading which it takes as a security, be compelled, on collecting the purchase price, to pay to the consignee much more than it has received from him?

In the cases mentioned, as the assignee bank was not an original party to the warranty, and had not even promised to assume any liability upon it, it would seem that the court's ruling, if it can be sustained at all, must be based, not on a breach of warranty to which the bank was not a party, but on the equities of the transaction, namely: that, as the assignee succeeded to no greater rights than the consignor had, and by receiving payment of the purchase price in full, it had received more than it was entitled to, and as it was paid under a mistake of fact (that is, a mistake as to the quality of the goods), and especially as the consignee had had no opportunity to inspect them, it should be required to return the excess received, under the general rule that where a payment is made under a mistake of facts it may be recovered back, although the one making the payment had the means of ascertaining the facts, if the position of the party receiving payment has not been changed in consequence thereof.

A fair measure of damages in such a case as against the assignee would seem to be the difference between the actual value of the goods and their value if they had been as warranted, not to exceed in any case the contract price.

There is, however, another principle involved in both these cases, which does not seem to have been considered by the court in either case. If the drafts were, as the reports leave us to infer, negotiable instruments. After the acceptance, or in this case the payment, of the drafts to which the bills of lading were attached the principles governing negotiable instruments applied, and as the assignee of the bill of lading was a bona fide holder of the draft the drawee could not recover back a payment made, and

The buyer must return or offer to return the article in a reasonable time after its falsity is discovered.

Smith v. Love, 64 N. C. 440.

A breach of the contract was not a breach of warranty, but a mere noncompliance with the contract that the defendant had agreed to fulfil.

Reed v. Randall, 29 N. Y. 358, 86 Am. Dec. 307.

A warranty can only exist where the subject-matter of the sale is ascertained and existing.

Benjamin, Sales, § 895.

There must be notice to the vendor, within a reasonable time, that the vendee does not accept the goods as filling the contract, or a waiver of the implied contract will be presumed.

Morehouse v. Comstock, 42 Wis. 626; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 142, 143.

If he had accepted without paying he would have been absolutely liable on such acceptance, notwithstanding a partial, or even a total, failure of consideration between him and the drawer. It would also seem that if the assignee had previously promised to accept a draft drawn on the bill of lading, or had authorized the consignor to draw on him for the purchase price, he would have been compelled to accept and pay the draft in the hands of a bona fide holder, although he discovered the defects in the goods before actual acceptance, the promise to accept being considered as an equivalent of acceptance.

This view is sustained by several cases, both in this country and in England. In Kelly v. Lynch, 22 Cal. 661, certain merchants had advanced money on a draft at three days' sight with bill of lading attached, and the consignor had thereafter given a second draft on such bill of lading in favor of a creditor, who indorsed it over to such merchants. The consignee was willing to accept the first draft and pay over any surplus remaining on the second draft, but was unwilling to accept both drafts, and a correspondent of the payee of the second draft accepted both drafts for the interest of such payee. The consignment proved to be nearly worthless, the consignor and the master of the vessel having been guilty of a gross fraud. An action was brought against the acceptor for the amount of the first draft, and he was held liable on the ground that there was a sufficient consideration for the acceptance, although the consignment was not as valuable as it was supposed to be,—especially as by such acceptance an acceptance on the part of the drawee was lost. The case is treated throughout as if there would have been no question whatever as to the liability of the drawee in case he had accepted the draft.

The above case of Kelly v. Lynch was decided on the authority of Robinson v. Reynolds, 2 Q. B. 196, which is stated therein to be fully in point. This case holds that a bank, to which a bill of exchange is indorsed for an advance made by it on the faith of a bill of lading for a purported consignment by the drawer to the drawee, may recover on an acceptance by the latter on the credit of the drawer and on the faith of the bill of lading which is thereupon transferred to him by the bank, although such bill of lading is forged, where the bank made no false representation in regard thereto, and knew nothing of the forgery, as the fact that there was a total want of consideration between the drawer and drawee of a bill of exchange does not affect a bona fide transferee without notice.

It is considered sufficient evidence of acceptance that the vendee has not returned or offered to return the goods, nor notified the vendor of nonacceptance.

4, 1 L. T. N. S. 50, 8 Week. Rep. 14, is quite similar. In this case a foreign factor authorized his correspondent to draw on him against a bill of lading to be shipped. The correspondent drew bills of exchange, and sent them with a forged bill of lading to his banker, who remitted the money to him. The bills of exchange were forwarded and accepted under the belief that the bill of lading was genuine. The acceptor brought an action to compel the banker to deliver up the bills of exchange, and the court refused to compel such delivery on the bank's undertaking to deliver up the bills of exchange if the decision at law should be against him. The lord chancellor held that the case was similar to that of Robinson v. Reynolds, and that on the merits the acceptor was liable.

In Woods v. Thiedemann, 1 Hurlst. & C. 478, a merchant in England received word from a merchant in Prussia that he was inclined to send him a cargo of wheat, and wished to know to what amount the English merchant would give him credit, and the latter authorized him to draw for a specified amount per quarter of wheat. The English merchant received word that a specified amount of wheat had been shipped, and that a bill of exchange had been drawn on a designated London bank. He asked his bankers to request the London bank which was their agent, to accept the bills of exchange for him, having previously stated that it would be for a large amount, and that the acceptance must be only on the strength of the bill of lading. The London Bank accepted the bills of exchange when presented by bona fide holders, and, although the bill of lading proved to be forged, was compelled to pay the same, receiving the amount thereof from such bankers who had induced it to accept. The court permitted the bankers to recover from their customer, the consignee, holding that it was not their duty, but that of the consignee, to see to the genuineness of the bill of lading, and that if he was unwilling to assume the risk he should have refused to give an order until he had satisfied himself that the goods were shipped and a genuine bill of lading issued.

In Leather v. Simpson, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 178, L. R. 11 Eq. 398, 24 L. T. N. S. 286, 19 Week. Rep. 431, 1 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 5, a consignor notified his consignees that he would consign cotton to them. He then transmitted to a bank a bill of exchange on such consignees with a purported bill of lading attached, which was in fact forged. The bank transmitted the bill of exchange to the drawees with a memorandum that it held a bill of lading for the cotton. The

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In January, 1899, the defendant Gregg, in Chicago, Illinois, sold to plaintiffs, Finch, Richardson, & Co., at Springhope, North Carolina, a bill of exchange was accepted by the consignees, and paid before maturity to enable them to obtain the cotton, after which the forgery was discovered. They then brought an action to have the money returned, but the court held that the case was similar to Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt and Robinson v. Reynolds, except that the money had actually been paid, on account of which fact there was still stronger reason for holding against the acceptor.

In Baxter v. Chapman, 29 L. T. N. S. 642, 2 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 170, the acceptor of a bill of exchange with a forged bill of lading attached discovered the forgery before the acceptance was paid, and refused to pay the same unless a genuine bill of lading should be turned over to him. The court held, however, that he was liable on such acceptance, and that he could not impose such a condition of payment.

In Hoffman v. Bank of Milwaukee, 12 Wa'l. 181, sub nom. Hoffman v. National City Bank, 20 L. ed. 366, bills of exchange attached to a bill of lading were discounted by a bank, the drawee having previously promised the drawer to honor them. The drawee paid the bills of exchange when presented, and afterwards discovered that the bills of lading were forged, and sued to recover back the amount. The court held that money paid by the acceptor of a bill of exchange in discharge of his legal obligation as such is not paid by mistake or without consideration unless the bill of exchange was fraudulent in its inception, the consideration was illegal, or the facts impeaching the transaction were known to the holder at the time he became such, and that the fact that the acceptance was made on the faith of the bills of lading attached made no difference, where the bills of exchange were in the usual form and did not refer to the bills of lading, and the acceptance was made at the request of the drawers, and upon their representations that the goods had been shipped. The court also held that the payee who discounts a bill of exchange at the request of the drawer is regarded as a stranger to the acceptor as to the consideration for the acceptance, and if the acceptance is absolute in 40 L. R. A.

its terms, and the bill was received in good faith and for value, the payee may recover, though there was no consideration for the acceptance, or the consideration had failed; and that it was immaterial whether the bill of exchange was accepted while in the hands of the drawer at his request or after it had passed into the hands of the payee and at his request.

In Goetz v. Bank of Kansas City, 119 U. S. 551, 30 L. ed. 515, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 318, a bank discounted several drafts with bills of lading attached. The consignee after accepting and paying several drafts discovered that the bills of lading were forged, whereupon he refused to pay one draft which he had accepted, and sued to recover the amount of the drafts which he had paid. The court held that the bank did not, by discounting the drafts, or by indorsing invoices accompanying the bills of lading "for collection," guarantee the genuineness of the bills of lading, and that its right to recover on the acceptances was not defeated by the mere failure to inquire into the consideration of the draft because of rumors or general reputation as to the bad character of the drawer.

In Young v. Lehman, 63 Ala. 519, the consignee had written to the consignor a letter stating that the latter could, for any shipment of cotton to the former, draw on him for three fourths of the value of the cotton with bills of lading attached. A draft was drawn with a forged bill of lading attached and discounted by a bank. The consignee having been informed that a shipment had been made on which a draft had been drawn paid the draft when presented. On discovering the forgery he sued to recover back the amount of the draft as money paid under mistake. The court held that it was not the duty of the bank to see that the bill of lading was genuine, and that if it was not genuine there was simply a failure of the security for which the consignee stipulated with the drawer, and that the acceptor of a bill of exchange could not resist payment as against a bona fide holder because the acceptance was without consideration, or because the consideration had failed.

olina a car load of "good corn." Said Gregg drew a draft on plaintiffs for the price of the corn, and sold it to the Seymour-Danne Company, to which was attached the bill of lading, which was made out to his order, and which he assigned by indorsement to the purchasers of the draft. The plaintiffs paid said draft, but the car load of corn was injured, and the damage sustained thereby is the ground of plaintiffs' action. Love v. Miller, 104 N. C. 582, 10 S. E. 685. In May, 1899, the defendant Gregg sold another carload of corn to Finch, Richardson, & Co., Springhope, North Carolina, and also a carload to Woodward & Copeland at the same place. As with the January shipment, the bills of lading were made out to the order of shipper, who indorsed them to the Seymour-Danne Company, with a draft attached, drawn on the purchasers in Springhope. On arrival the two carloads were attached before a justice of the peace (the amount claimed being less than $200) for the damages above stated, as sustained on the January shipment. To this proceeding Joseph Gregg alone was defendant, but the Seymour-Danne Company appeared before the justice of the peace, through their attorney, and were "allowed to make themselves parties defendant, and, intervening, they defended said action." In the superior court, on appeal, the plaintiffs were allowed to amend the attachment proceedings by making the Seymour-Danne Company parties thereto. When the bill of lading, payable to order of shipper, was assigned by him, for value (i. e., cashing of draft upon purchaser attached), to the Seymour-Danne Company, the latter became owner of the corn as against all the world except the shipper, as to whom the assignment was a security for the amount of the draft. Dows v. National Each. Bank, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. ed. 214; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1734a. Upon the arrival of the corn shipped in May at Springhope, Gregg had no interest therein which could be attached (Emery v. Irving Nat. Bank, 25 Ohio St. 360, 18 Am. Rep. 209), unless, possibly, it had been shown that the amount to be paid for the corn was greater than the amount for which the Seymour-Danne Company held the bill of lading as security; but that point does not arise here. But when the Seymour-Danne Company took the bill of lading on both occasions equally they took the contract of the shipper, and they stood in his shoes, with the same rights; no greater, no less. National Bank of Commerce v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 92, 23 L. ed. 208. The rights of the pur-

First Nat. Bank v. Burkham, 32 Mich. 328, holds that after the drawee has accepted and paid a bill of exchange they cannot recover from the payee on the ground that the acceptance and payment were on the faith of a security from the drawer which proved to be fictitious, although the payee also relied on such security, or on the ground that the payment was made under a mistake of fact. In this case the court says that the payee must in every case of discounting a bill rely on such security as he has from the drawer until the bill is paid or accepted. After that he is furnished with conclusive evidence that the drawer was authorized to draw the bill, and that it is immaterial what the payee relied on before payment or acceptance, the law leaving the risk with him, but that after such payment or acceptance the risk, if any, passes to the drawee. Although the decision in this case does not disclose what the security was, the principle involved would be the same whether it was a bill of lading or some other security.

In Craig v. Sibbett, 15 Pa. 238, brokers discounted a bill of exchange knowing that it was drawn against flour supposed by them to have been consigned to the drawee, the drawer having in fact procured the signature of the master to a bill of lading for flour never put on board. The bill was accepted and payment refused on discovery of the fraud. The claim was made that as the bill of lading was indorsed to the brokers as security in case of nonacceptance, they were apprised of the course of dealing, and must have known that the acceptance was on the tacit condition that the flour would be forwarded. The court, however, held that the drawee was liable on his acceptance, and that the fact that the brokers became holders of the bill before its acceptance was immaterial.

In Randolph v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 7 Baxt. 458, a consignee of cotton authorized the consignor to draw on him at the rate of $90 for each bale of cotton shipped. After a draft with bill of lading attached had been discounted for the consignor word was received to draw for 49 L. R. A.

only $80 per bale of cotton, whereupon the discounting bank wrote to its correspondent agreeing in effect to guarantee the consignee for the excess of the draft over $80 per bale of cotton. When the draft was presented the consignee at first refused to accept, but afterwards did so on being shown such letter and told by the vice president of the correspondent bank that in his individual opinion it guaranteed the entire draft. A sight draft discounted by the same bank was afterwards paid by the consignee when presented, and the draft which had been accepted was paid at its maturity. The consignee thereafter discovered that the bills of lading, in reliance on which the acceptances had been made, were fictitious, or at least that no cotton had been shipped, and brought suit to recover the amount paid on the drafts. In the opinion the court states that it is conceded no recovery could be had as to the sight draft or on the other draft if it had been accepted without the guaranty of the bank, and holds that such guaranty had no effect except to make the bank liable for the excess above the $80 per bale of cotton.

Bockoven v. National Mechanics' & Traders' Bank, 11 W. N. C. 570, holds that an unconditional acceptance of a bill of exchange renders the acceptor liable, although the holder knew that the bill was accepted on the faith of a consignment to be made by the drawer and prevented such consignment by attaching the goods intended to be shipped for a debt due from the drawer.

From these cases, all of which hold that after a draft attached to a bill of lading is accepted the consignee becomes absolutely liable on the acceptance, and that after payment thereon is made he cannot recover it back, notwithstanding any failure of consideration between him and the drawer, it would seem that the decisions in the main case, and in Landa v. Lattin Bros. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 246, 46 S. W. 48, supra, were based on a wrong principle, and that if the right principle had been considered the decisions must have been different.

J. H. H.

chasers (the plaintiffs) "were not impaired or disturbed by the change of ownership in the property." They have the same defenses against the assignee of the bill of lading as against the shipper. Columbian Nat. Bank v. White, 65 Mo. App. 679. When the January car load arrived, the plaintiffs could either have refused to receive and pay for the corn, or they could have received it, and, upon notification of defects to the vendor in a reasonable time, have offered to return the goods, or, if sued for the price, have set up loss by reason of such defects. Kester Bros. v. Miller Bros., 119 N. C. 475, 26 S. E. 115; McKinnon v. McIntosh, 98 N. C. 89, 3 S. E. 840. But here, the corn being shipped on a bill of lading with draft attached, the vendee was compelled to pay upon the delivery of the corn (if it was otherwise, liberty to inspect should have been shown), and an action lies to recover back money paid for defects in the corn, unless the claim was waived by delay to demand damages from January till this attachment in May. Lewis v. Rountree, 78 N. C. 323. Whether there had been a waiver was an issue of fact for the jury, to have been proven by the party alleging it. Both parties have agreed upon the facts as set out in the justice's return, and no waiver is therein found. The plaintiffs had, therefore, the same ground of action for damages against the Seymour-Danne Company for the defects in the January car load that they would have had against their assignor, Gregg, and on the arrival of two car loads in May, likewise assigned to the Seymour-Danne Company, while plaintiffs could not attach them as the property of Gregg, nor for damages due by Gregg, they could attach said car loads as the property of the Seymour-Danne Company, and for the damages sustained by delivery of a defective car load of corn to them by that company in January. Landa v. Lattin Bros., 19 Tex. Civ. App. 240, 46 S. W. 48 (which we find a very clear and able discussion of a case "on all fours" with this). It is true the action was originally begun against Gregg alone, which could not be sustained, as no jurisdiction as to him was obtained by attaching the two car loads of grain, which, by the assignment of the bills of lading, had become the property of the Seymour-Danne Company; but the latter came in and were made parties before the justice, by which the court was seized of jurisdiction as to them, and on appeal the judge properly permitted the attachment proceedings to be amended to embrace them, as they were already parties, and claiming an interest in the subject-matter of the action. Code, § 184. The entry before the justice was, as the judge found, of a general appearance by the Seymour-Danne Company; but, if it had been an appearance merely "as interveners," to contest the title to the property, it would not have been an unauthorized change of the action in a proceeding quasi in rem, by attachment of property, to permit the plaintiffs to amend their attachment to embrace the same cause of action against the interveners as they had averred against the original defendant. 49 L. R. A.

Why turn the property loose, to be again attached by the same plaintiffs, for the same cause of action, eo instanti it is determined that these defendants (or interveners, if such) are the real owners of the attached property, instead of the original defendant?

The judgment must be modified by dismissing the action as to Joseph Gregg, who entered a special appearance, with his reasonable costs, but as to the Seymour-Danne Company it is affirmed.

CAROLINA CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

(126 N. C. 634.)

1. A railway company is not liable for the death of a person walking upon its track, going in the same direction as the train which killed him, in open daylight, on a straight piece of road, where he could have seen the train for 150 yards, and had power, up to the last moment, to prevent the accident, although the railroad company was guilty of negligence in running its engine at a prohibited rate of speed, and in not ringing its bell as required by ordinance, and in not keeping a proper lookout.

2. The question of the contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate killed by a railroad train, is for the court, where there is no contradiction in his evidence, and defendant, who submits no evidence, demurs to that offered by plaintiff, thereby admitting its truth, and moves for a nonsuit.

(May 22, 1900.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Mecklenburg County in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jones & Tillett and Clarkson & Duls for appellant.

Messrs. Burwell, Walker, & Cassler, for appellee:

It is only the negligence which proximately causes the injury, that is considered by the law in determining the liability of the defendant.

There was no negligence on the part of the defendant, and, if there was, the intestate's

NOTE.—For contributory negligence of person on railroad track, see also Kelley v. Missouri P. R. Co. (Mo.) 8 L. R. A. 783; Spicer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (W. Va.) 11 L. R. A. 385; *Patton v. negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and, in contemplation of the law, the only cause.

When a person walks upon the track of a railroad company it is his duty to look and listen for approaching trains, and to leave the track in time to avoid injury to himself from them, and, when he is possessed of the senses of sight and hearing, which is presumed till the contrary appears and is made known to the engineer, the latter has the right to suppose, up to the last moment and when it is too late to avert the injury, that the person will leave the track in time to avoid an injury to himself, and, if the person fails to do so, and is injured, the law does not refer the injury to any negligence on the part of the railroad company, but to the wrongful and careless act of the person injured, in not leaving the track.

McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. E. 316; High v. Carolina O. R. Co. 112 N. C. 385, 17 S. E. 79.

The decision in such cases depends altogether upon the conduct of the injured person, or user of the track, and, if he was not so situated that he could not step from the track before the engine reached him, and he was injured, the law imputes the fault to him, as the sole author of his own injury.

Meredith v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. 137; Norwood v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 111 N. C. 236, 16 S. E. 4; Syme v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 113 N. C. 558, 18 S. E. 114.

Where a party is injured by the want of ordinary care and diligence in another, but he does not use reasonable care and diligence himself, he cannot recover. He must be reasonably careful and diligent to protect himself from danger, no matter how it may arise.

Furches, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for the wrongful killing of Charles M. Coffin. The defendant does not deny the killing, but denies that it was caused by its default or negligence, and alleges that it was the result of the negligence of plaintiff's intestate. The evidence of plaintiff showed that intestate was killed by the shifting engine on defendant's road, in the city of Charlotte; that this engine was running backwards, drawing a gondola car after it; that it was running at a high rate of speed, in a westward direction, and intestate was walking on defendant's track, going in the same direction; that this train had come very near running over a team of mules at the street crossing, scaring the mules, and making them unmanageable, and that the engineer and crew were watching the mules, and laughing at the driver trying to manage them. The road was straight for 150 yards, and, as the killing occurred in open daylight, the crew and engineer might have seen intestate, and intestate might have seen the train, for that distance. The intestate was walking on the defendant's track when he was knocked down by defendant's train, run over, and killed. The plaintiff also offered in evidence an ordinance of the city forbidding trains to run at a greater speed than 4 miles an hour while passing through the city, and requiring the bell to be rung. Plaintiff showed that this train was running at a high rate of speed, and greater than that allowed by the ordinance, and that no bell was being rung. The plaintiff, having offered evidence as to amount of damages, rested the case. Defendant offered no evidence, demurred to plaintiff's evidence, and moved to nonsuit plaintiff, under chapter 109, Acts 1897. After hearing argument of counsel, and upon full consideration of the matter, the court allowed defendant's motion, and assigned the following reasons therefor: "First. That the evidence, if believed, showed the defendant guilty of negligence. Second. That the evidence being that offered by the plaintiff, and without contradiction, must, as to the plaintiff, be believed, and, if believed, it showed, and the conclusion could not be reasonably avoided, that the plaintiff's intestate, by his own negligence, contributed to cause the injury. Third. That while it might be found that, notwithstanding the negligence of plaintiff's intestate, the defendant might, by ordinary care, have avoided the injury, the evidence, which, as to the plaintiff, must be believed, clearly showed that, notwithstanding defendant's negligence, the plaintiff's intestate, by the exercise of ordinary care, might himself, up to the last moment, have avoided the injury. Therefore the negligence of plaintiff's intestate, if not the proximate cause, at least concurred with defendant's negligence, up to the last moment, in together constituting the proximate cause of the injury. The third issue, therefore, should be answered 'No,' and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in the action. In deference to this intimation, the plaintiff, having excepted, submitted to a non-suit, and judgment was entered accordingly." The plaintiff assigned the following grounds of error: (1) "That the court added at the end of the third issue tendered the clause, 'And, if so, was defendant's failure to avoid the injury the proximate cause thereof?'" (2) "The plaintiff assigns as error the rulings of his honor sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action." (3) "That the court, in and by its said judgment, dismissed the action." The evidence was all introduced by the plaintiff; the defendant introduced none; and there is no exception as to the competency of any of the evidence.

The court finds from this evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence; and while we think from the evidence, taken to be true, that it was guilty of negligence, as this negligence was shown by the evidence of the plaintiff, the court could not have found this issue against the defendant, if it had, complained of and excepted to it, and brought it before us for review. It was the finding of an affirmative issue against the defendant upon the evidence of the plaintiff. Spruill v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 39; Anniston Nat. Bank v. Durham School Committee, 121 N. C. 109, 28 S. E. 134; White v. Suffolk & C. R. Co. 121 N. C. 484, 27 S. E. 1002. But this ruling is not before us for review. The defendant neither excepted nor appealed, and the plaintiff cannot except to this finding, because it is in his favor. And it seems to us that there can be no doubt but what the intestate of the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence, if the evidence be true, and every word of it believed. This issue is, then, not one that must be found by a jury, but one that may be found by the court. It does not present a question where reasonable men might put different constructions upon it, and come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of negligence. If plaintiff's intestate was walking upon defendant's road, in open daylight, on a straight piece of road, where he could have seen defendant's train for 150 yards, and was run over and injured, he was guilty of negligence. And, although the defendant may have also been guilty of negligence in running its train at a greater rate of speed than was allowed by the town ordinance, or in not ringing its bell as required by said ordinance, and in not keeping a lookout by its engineer as it should have done, yet the injury would be attributed to the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate. It has been so held in Meredith v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. 137; Norwood v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 111 N. C. 236, 16 S. E. 4; High v. Carolina C. R. Co. 112 N. C. 385, 17 S. E. 79. These cases hold that it is not negligence in a railroad company where its train runs over a man walking on the railroad track, apparently in possession of his faculties, and in the absence of any reason to suppose that he was not. This is put upon the ground that the engineer may reasonably suppose that the man will step off in time to prevent injury. In McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. E. 316, this doctrine is expressly held; and it is further held in that case that, on account of plaintiff's negligence in standing on the road and allowing defendant's train to run over him, this was concurring negligence, and prevented him from recovering damages. McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co. has been cited and approved on this point in Syme v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 113 N. C. 505, 18 S. E. 114, and in Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 744, 25 L. R. A. 287, 19 S. E. 363, 923, and many other cases. We know that it has been held in many cases that a railroad company is liable for damages for carelessly and negligently running over and killing or injuring persons on its road, in which it appeared that the persons killed or injured were also guilty of negligence; and it may not be easy to distinguish some of these from the one under consideration. But there is a distinction, and a distinct line of decisions, as we have shown by the cases we have cited. The distinction does not seem to lie so much in the negligence of the parties, where both are guilty of negligence, as it does in the condition of the parties. And we think, upon examination, that it will be found that, where the company has been held liable, it is in cases where the party injured was not upon equal opportunities with the defendant to avoid the injury, and in cases where there was something suggesting to the defendant the injured party's disadvantage or disability; as where the party injured is lying on the railroad track, apparently drunk, or asleep, or on a bridge or trestle, where he could not escape, or could not do so without great danger. In such cases, if the engineer saw the party injured or by proper diligence should have seen him, the company is liable. It is in such cases as these that the doctrine of proximate cause, or the "last clear chance," is called in to determine the liability.

The doctrine of proximate cause—the "last clear chance"—is firmly established in this state, and we have no idea of abandoning or in any way disturbing it. We think the line of cases where it applies are distinct, and distinguishable from this case, whether we have succeeded in pointing out the distinction or not. Indeed, we do not understand the plaintiff to make this the principal ground upon which he rests his appeal and insists upon a new trial. Nor do we understand the plaintiff seriously to insist but what there is evidence tending to prove—if not to prove—that the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of negligence. But it is contended that if the intestate was guilty of negligence, the defendant being also guilty of negligence, the intestate's negligence was what is termed "contributory negligence," and that contributory negligence is an affirmative issue, and cannot be found by the court. To sustain this position, a number of recent cases have been cited; among them, Spruill v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 39, and Anniston Nat. Bank v. Durham School Committee, 121 N. C. 109, 28 S. E. 134. In these cases, and quite a number of others, it was held that the court could not find an affirmative issue. This holding was entirely correct in those cases and in every other case where it has been held, so far as we remember. We do not wish to overrule or disturb this doctrine, as held in those cases; but to our minds this case is clearly distinguishable from them, as we hope to be able to show. In those cases, and in all others, as we think, where this has been held, there was some doubtful or disputed fact to be found, dependent upon the weight or the credit of the evidence. In such cases the court cannot find the facts, nor even intimate an opinion, without violating the statute of 1796 (Code, § 413); and, if the court has done so in this case, the plaintiff is entitled to a new trial. But the function of the jury is to find the facts (this must mean disputed facts), and must be exercised where there is evidence proving or tending to prove the facts disputed. If there is not, it is the duty of the court to say so and withdraw this dispute—this issue—from the jury. This was conceded by the plaintiff, it being a negative finding of the issue. But the plaintiff contends that to find the intestate guilty of negligence was an affirmative finding, and one the court could not find. This is logically and legally true if the court had to find any disputed fact where there was any evidence showing or tending to show the negative of the issue, or if it was necessary that he should pass upon the weight or credit of the evidence. Where this is the case, the usual rule is to submit the issue to the jury, with the instruction that, if they believe the evidence, they will find the issue yes or no, as the case may be. This is usually a good rule, and in many cases saves an appeal to this court. But the court could not do that in this case without impeaching the plaintiff's witnesses. All the evidence was offered by the plaintiff, and the defendant had demurred to it. This was an admission by the defendant that the evidence was true. The plaintiff, by offering the evidence, had vouched for its credit. He could not impeach its credit. As to the plaintiff, it stood unimpeached and unimpeachable. It is true that, if the plaintiff offered other evidence tending to show the facts different, then it would have become a matter for the jury as to which witness they would believe. But both witnesses stand alike credited, so far as the plaintiff or the party introducing them is concerned. If this evidence, or any part of it, had been introduced by the defendant, it would have been the duty of the court to submit it to the jury, because the plaintiff would not have been bound to give credit to the defendant's witnesses, and the defendant could not give them credit by demurring to their evidence. But when the defendant demurred to the plaintiff's evidence (and but one construction can reasonably be drawn from it; that is, it could not reasonably mean different things), we cannot see why it did not become a question of law, as much so as if the facts stated in the evidence had been agreed to, as the facts in the case; and, if this is so, it certainly became a question of law for the court. This view of the case is sustained by Williams v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 116 N. C. 556, 21 S. E. 298; Hinshaw v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. 118 N. C. 1047, 24 S. E. 426; Hygienic Plate Ice Mfg. Co. v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 122 N. C. 881, 29 S. E. 575; White v. Suffolk & C. R. Co. 121 N. C. 484, 27 S. E. 1002,—and we do not think it will be found to conflict with any opinion of this court. A number of cases may be found (some of which we have cited) in which it is said that the court cannot find an affirmative issue; and this is true in those cases, and in all cases where the court would have to find the facts to establish an affirmative issue. But in this case the court finds no facts. They are admitted by the demurrer of the defendant to the plaintiff's testimony. This being so, and the plaintiff's evidence clearly establishing the intestate's negligence, which was the concurrent cause of the injury, the plaintiff cannot recover, without overruling the authorities we have cited, 49 L. R. A.

and many others not cited. The doctrine of proximate cause and "the last clear chance" is not involved in this case. It falls under the doctrine announced in McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. E. 316, and that line of cases.

Taking the view of the case we do, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Faireloth, Ch. J., concurring:

When the plaintiff closed his evidence, defendant moved that plaintiff be nonsuited for the reason that upon his own evidence he was not entitled to recover. His honor was of opinion that the evidence, if believed, showed the defendant guilty of negligence; that the evidence, being that of the plaintiff, and without contradiction, must, as to the plaintiff, be believed, and, if believed, it showed that plaintiff's intestate, by his own negligence, contributed to cause the injury. The intestate was walking on the track of the defendant company when he was struck by the defendant's shifting engine and killed. At the time he was struck the intestate was walking along the track, in full possession of his senses, and in a place where he had a full view of the approaching engine for a long distance. The track was perfectly straight from the place where the intestate was struck by the engine to the crossing of the Southern Railway Company, a distance of 2 blocks and 225 feet, or 1,000 feet in round numbers; and there was no obstruction whatever to his view. There was a path running alongside of the track where plaintiff was walking at the time the engine struck him. Plaintiff's witness Sophia Lee testified that she saw the train, and heard it coming, and that plaintiff's intestate was between her and the train, walking right along the track, on a clear day. Upon this evidence it appears to me that, assuming the defendant to have been negligent, the causation of the injury was the concurrent negligence of both parties, and it has often been held that in that event neither party can recover. In McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. E. 316,—a case quite like the present,—the court held that "the plaintiff could not recover if the engineer and fireman, without any actual knowledge of or acquaintance with him, had acted, as they did, on the assumption that he [intestate] would get out of the way." "There was no error . . . in the instruction predicated upon the supposition that they failed to ring [the bell]. According to the plaintiff's own testimony, he stood upon the track with his back towards the engine, and did not see it till after he was stricken by it. He was therefore, in any aspect of the case, negligent, and the jury would not have been warranted in finding that the defendant could have prevented the injury by using ordinary care." The court further says that it could make no difference at what rate of speed the engine was running at the time. "All this might possibly have been more clearly presented, if there had been a third issue, and his honor had said there was no testimony to support an affirmative finding on it." The principles stated and applied in McAdoo's Case have since been repeatedly affirmed by this court, and expressed in emphatic language. In Meredith v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 610, 13 S. E. 137, the court said: "We concur with the judge below in the opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because, by the undisputed facts, considered in any phase presented by them, the plaintiff was negligent in failing to see the train approaching him from behind, while the servant of the defendant was not in fault in acting on the belief that plaintiff would move out of the way of the engine before it should reach him." In Norwood v. Ralcoigh & G. R. Co. 111 N. C. 236, 16 S. E. 4, this court decides: "If the engineer could, by proper watchfulness, have seen intestate standing or walking on the track, he would not have been negligent in acting on the assumption that intestate would step off in time to avert injury; and where the intestate was seen, or could, by proper care, have been seen, by the engineer, sitting upright on the end of a cross-tie, the latter was justified in believing that he would get out of danger; and his failure to leave the track, whether he was a trespasser or licensee, is considered by the law as the proximate cause of his death, unless it is shown that his condition or situation was such that he could not leave the track, and that this was known, or could, by the exercise of proper care, have been known, to the engineer." In High v. Carolina C. R. Co. 112 N. C. 385, 17 S. E. 79, this court decides: "Where an engineer sees on the track, in front of the engine which he is moving, a person walking or standing, whom he does not know at all, or who is known by him to be in full possession of his senses and faculties, the former is justified in assuming, up to the last moment, that the latter will step off the track in time to avoid injury; and, if such person is injured, the law imputes it to his own negligence, and holds the railroad company blameless." "The failure of the engineer to keep a proper lookout subjects the company to liability only in those cases where, if he had seen the situation of the injured party, it would have become his duty to pursue such a course of conduct as would have averted it. Whether he saw the plaintiff at a distance of 150 yards or of 10 feet, he was not at fault in acting on the supposition that she would still get out of the way. It is not material whether the train was moving fast or slow in such a case as this." "If the plaintiff had looked and listened for approaching trains, as a person using a track for a footway should, in the exercise of ordinary care, always do, she would have seen that the train, contrary to the usual custom, was moving on the siding. The facts that it was a windy day, and that she was wearing a bonnet, or that the train was late, gave her no greater privilege than she would otherwise have enjoyed as licensee, but, on the contrary, should have made her more watchful." "There was nothing in the conduct or condition of the plaintiff that imposed upon the engineer, in determining what course he should pursue, the duty of departing from the usual rule that the servant of a company is warranted in expecting licensees or trespassers, apparently sound in mind and body, and in possession of their senses, to leave the track till it is too late to prevent a collision." In Syme v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 113 N. C. 558, 18 S. E. 114, this court decides: "When a person is injured while walking on a railroad track by an engine that he might have seen by looking, the law, as a rule, imputes the injury to his own negligence. There being no testimony tending to bring this case within any exception to the general rule, we are of the opinion that there was no evidence of want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, while, in any aspect of the case, the plaintiff's intestate was negligent in getting upon the track in front of the engine without looking, and exposing his person to injury, when he might have seen that [the engine] was approaching, and have avoided the collision by stepping off the track." "On the other hand, the engineer was justified in assuming that the intestate had looked, had notice of his approach, and would clear the track in ample time to save himself from harm." Other cases might be cited of the same purport.

The defendant's motion was, in effect, a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, admitting every word to be true, and every fact that can be gathered from it. I am unable to see what is left for the jury to pass upon. I understand that when facts are agreed upon, or found by a special verdict, or admitted by demurrer, nothing remains to be done, except for the court to apply and fit the law to the facts. Here the proximate cause of the injury is plainly and manifestly the joint concurrent negligence of both parties, and there is no place found in these facts for what is called the "last clear chance." When the facts are clearly settled, from which only one inference can be drawn, the question is then one of law for the court to decide, and in such case the court should take the case from the jury, and direct a nonsuit or verdict, as the case may be. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. p. 68, § 56; Cooley, Torts, 670. That the causes of the injury are concurrent seems plain according to these facts. Possibly, some sort of logic might conclude differently, but that is not the common-sense view to my mind; and, when logic and common sense cannot be reconciled, logic must give way.

Douglas, J., dissenting:

It is with a feeling of deep regret and much hesitation that I am forced to enter my most earnest dissent from the opinion of the court. I wish I could agree with the majority of the court that its opinion does not conflict with our former rulings, but I am utterly unable to do so with those cases before me. That plain words may have a hidden legal meaning utterly at variance with the ordinary usage of the language, and which I did not intend them to have, and never dreamed they could have, when I used them, is beyond my comprehension. Feeling as I do, I would be untrue to myself were I to concur in an opinion which, to my mind, destroys the principle of our recent decisions, is in direct violation of the statute, and flatly contravenes the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. The rule as now laid down, stripped of its incidents, is as follows: "That the court may withdraw an issue from the jury, and direct an affirmative finding of contributory negligence against the plaintiff, whenever it thinks that the evidence of to find that it was of sufficient weight to prove the fact in controversy." That is all there is in it, dilute it as we may. It is true the court says, "provided there is no conflict in the testimony," but such a want of conflict does not of itself prove the issue. There may be only one witness or fifty witnesses swearing to the same thing, and, unless they swear to enough to prove the fact in issue, neither the court nor the jury can find it to be true. This line of reasoning forces me to the conclusion which this court has recently so repeatedly and emphatically announced, but which it now seems at least partially to repudiate,—that the court can never direct an affirmative finding of fact. To do so, it would be necessary for the court to pass directly upon the weight of the evidence, and to find that it was of sufficient weight to overcome the negative presumption always arising from the burden of proof; in other words, it would be saying, in the teeth of the statute, that a fact which the law required to be proved had been "sufficiently proven." And yet Mr. Justice Furches, speaking for a unanimous court in Anniston Nat. Bank v. Durham School Committee, 121 N. C. 109, 28 S. E. 134, says that this cannot be done, using the following words: "But no matter how strong and contradictory the evidence is in support of the issue, the court cannot withdraw such issue from the jury, and direct an affirmative finding. To do this is to violate the act of 1796 (§ 413 of the Code)." In White v. Suffolk & C. R. Co. 121 N. C. 484, 489, 27 S. E. 1002, the same justice, again speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The court can never find nor direct an affirmative finding of the jury. . . . The most the court can do is to instruct the jury, where there is no conflict of evidence, that, if they believe the evidence, they should find yes or no, as the case may be." In Wood v. Bartholomew, 122 N. C. 177, 180, 29 S. E. 960, Justice Furches, again speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The burden of the issue of contributory negligence is on the defendant. It is an affirmative issue, and cannot be found by the court. It must be determined by the jury." Other opinions of the same learned justice contain expressions to the same effect. The italics are my own. These emphatic expressions were neither casual nor obiter, but were used in the decision of questions directly raised, and in answer to the strenuous contentions of counsel urged in repeated and elaborate arguments. This court, at the last term, after most careful consideration, speaking without dissent through Mr. Justice Montgomery, in Creus v. Canticell, 125 N. C. 516, 519, 34 S. E. 688, after intimating that the burden was really on the defendant, uses the following language: "The instruction then of his honor was erroneous, for, as the burden of proof was assumed by the plaintiff, the court could not withdraw the issue from the jury." Anniston Nat. Bank v. Durham School Committee, 121 N. C. 109, 28 S. E. 134. In that case Justice Furches, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "But, no matter how strong and contradictory the evidence is in support of the issue, the court cannot withdraw such issue from the jury, and direct an affirmative finding." It should be noted that in that case the court based its judgment solely upon the fact that the plaintiff had assumed the burden of proof, and made no allusion whatever to the fact that the only evidence was that of the plaintiff. Mr. Justice Clark has used similar language in speaking for the court, and does not wish now either to modify or withdraw it. Speaking for a unanimous court, in Sherrill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 116 N. C. 655, he says, on page 657, 21 S. E. 429: "But when the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, then to instruct the jury that the evidence rebuts it and overcomes it is to invade the province of the jury, and violates chap. 452 of the Acts of 1796 (Code, § 413), which forbids an expression of opinion by the judge upon the weight of the evidence."

I may be pardoned for citing some of the opinions of the court written by myself. They are in plain words, plainly setting forth the views I was known to possess and intended to express. Whatever other faults they may have, my opinions are neither the intangible mists of summer nor the shifting winds of March. In Spruill v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 39, during my first term upon the bench, it is said for a unanimous court: "Where there is no evidence, or a mere scintilla of evidence, or the evidence is not sufficient, in a just and reasonable view of it, to warrant an inference of any fact in issue, the court should not leave the issue to be passed upon by the jury, but should direct a verdict against the party upon whom the burden of proof rests. That the verdict should be directed against the party upon whom rests the burden of proof is the essence of the rule. . . . If the verdict of a jury is in the opinion of the court against the weight of evidence, it can be set aside; and to the proper exercise of this discretion there can be no objection. But to permit the judge to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence necessary to rebut a legal presumption without submission to the jury would infringe upon the exclusive powers of the jury. . . . The rule laid down in some authorities that, wherever the judge would be justified in setting aside the verdict as against the weight of evidence, he would be equally justified in taking the case from the jury and directing a verdict, cannot receive our sanction. It is not the law in North Carolina, and never can be under our present Constitution. 'The ancient mode of trial by jury' guaranteed by the Constitution is that at common law, and is none the less the right of the citizen than it was of the subject. Direction of a verdict and granting a new trial are essentially different in nature and effect. The one regulates the trial by jury, the other denies it; the one recommit the case to the jury, the other takes it away completely; the one merely reopens the case for a fairer trial, while the other ends it without redress, save the precarious method of appeal, where findings of fact can be reviewed only from the meager notes of the judge and the uncertain recollection of counsel. The mere fact that the judge can never, save by waiver or consent, render a verdict, but can direct it only in the name of the jury, shows the intent and spirit of the law. These principles are 'fundamental,' and 'a frequent recurrence' thereto is of constitutional obligation." This case appears to have been cited in more than twenty different cases, including the opinion of the court from which I am respectfully dissenting. In Cow v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. 123 N. C. 604, 31 S. E. 848, this court, in reviewing Spruill's Case, says: "Had the question not been again presented by counsel, it would almost seem needless to repeat, what we have so often said, that the burden of proving negligence rests upon the plaintiff, while the onus of showing contributory negligence rests upon the defendant. In both cases this must be shown by a greater weight of the evidence, and of this relative weight the jury alone can determine. A negative presumption necessarily accompanies the burden, and remains until the burden is lifted or shifted by direct admissions or a preponderance of proof. . . . Where there is evidence tending to prove negligence on the part of both parties, the case must always be submitted to the jury, and it makes no difference if this evidence appears in the testimony of the plaintiff. The court may say to the jury that there is no evidence tending to prove a fact, but it can never say that a fact is proved. . . . It is the settled rule of this court that a verdict can never be directed in favor of the party upon whom rests the burden of proof, who in all cases is considered to have the affirmative of the issue, whatever may be its form. Though this rule was discussed and reaffirmed in Spruill v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 39, it did not have its origin in that case, but in Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451, where the doctrine was distinctly laid down in the following words, quoted from the opinion of Wells, J., in the court of exchequer chamber: 'There is in every case a preliminary question, which is one of law, viz. whether there is any evidence on which the jury could properly find the question for the party on whom the burden of proof lies. If there is not, the judge ought to withdraw the question from the jury, and direct a nonsuit, if the onus is on the plaintiff, or direct a verdict for the plaintiff if the onus is on the defendant.' In other words, the verdict must, in either event, be directed against the party on whom lies the onus, and by necessary implication can never be directed in his favor. . . . The burden of proving contributory negligence is always upon the defendant. Therefore a direction in his favor, based in any degree upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, would be a direction in favor of the party upon whom rested the burden of proof, which is directly opposed to the uniform current of our decisions. If there had been any reasonable doubt that the burden of proving contributory negligence rested upon the defendant, it has been set at rest by chapter 33 of the Laws of 1887. . . . It therefore follows that on a motion for a nonsuit the court can consider only the evidence relating to the negligence of the defendant, and, if there is more than a scintilla tending to prove such negligence, the motion must be denied, and the case submitted to the jury." That case cites a large number of authorities, which it is needless now to recite. Can there be any question as to its meaning? There was a single dissent. In Bolden v. Southern R. Co. 123 N. C. 614, 31 S. E. 851, this court, with a single dissent, says: "By force of statute, as well as a settled rule of decision, the plea of contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, in which the burden, both of allegation and proof, rests upon the defendant. It is true that contributory negligence may be shown by the evidence of the plaintiff, but whether the weight of that evidence is sufficient to overcome the presumption in his favor arising from the burden of proof is a question for the jury. The action of the plaintiff in going upon the bridge was argued as contributory negligence, but, if it be viewed as an implied assumption of risk, the same rule will apply. Both doctrines are alike as being in the nature of a plea of confession and avoidance, inasmuch as they are affirmative defenses set up to excuse the negligence of the defendant. As such, the burden of proof is in both cases upon the defendant, and an issue can be found in its favor only by a jury." In the subsequent case of Cogdell v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 124 N. C. 302, 32 S. E. 706, it is said by a unanimous court that "contributory negligence and assumption of risk, being in the nature of pleas in confession and avoidance, are affirmative defenses, and cannot be considered on a motion for nonsuit," citing Bolden v. Southern R. Co. 123 N. C. 614, 31 S. E. 851. It is useless to further cite the large number of cases wherein this court has said that the court could never direct an affirmative finding. If it did not mean "never" when it said it in the above cases, I suppose it did not mean it in the others. I meant it then, and mean it now.

The rule now adopted by the court is an adaptation of the Federal rule; and, while it may find a home with us by adoption, it is not to the manner born, and is the legitimate offspring neither of our Constitution nor of our laws. The Federal courts, as well as those of some few of the states, still adhere to the English practice of allowing the court to express an opinion upon the weight of the evidence; that is, the court, under this rule, may in all cases say to the jury what it thinks ought to be their verdict. This practice, which may serve to explain some decisions in those tribunals where it still exists, has been repudiated by a large majority of the states, and was positively prohibited by statute in this state as far back as 1796. This prohibition has been brought forward in successive compilations, and is still in force as § 413 of the Code, which reads as follows: "No judge, in giving a charge to the petit jury, either in a civil or a criminal action, shall give an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven, such matter being the true office and province of the jury; but he shall state in a plain and correct manner the evidence given in the case, and declare and explain the law arising thereon." This distinct line of demarkation between the powers of the judge and the jury, established in the childhood of our state, and remaining in full force for more than a hundred years, has become a fundamental part of "the law of the land." I am aware that there are some cases tending to sustain the rule now adopted by the court, but they were decided before I came upon the bench, and are in direct conflict with our later, as well as our earlier, decisions. The earliest case cited by the court is that of Meredith v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. 137, decided in 1891, which cites upon this point only the Cases of McAdoe, Parker, and Daily. In McAdoe's Case all the issues were submitted to the jury, and none found by the court. In Daily's Case, 106 N. C. 321, 11 S. E. 320, while the court below held that the plaintiff, who was an idiot, could not recover, on account of his contributory negligence, this court held that there was no evidence tending to prove the negligence of the defendant. Parker's Case, 86 N. C. 221, was decided before the passage of the act of 1887 (chap. 33), which expressly provides "that in all actions to recover damages by reason of the negligence of the defendant, where contributory negligence is relied upon as a defense, it shall be set up in the answer and proved on the trial." I am also aware that there have been two or three dicta to the same effect, but I do not feel bound by them. I am not responsible for all that may be said in an opinion from which I do not dissent, but only for such matters as are necessarily involved in the decision of the case. Dicta are the overflows of judicial learning, and, like the freshets in our streams, are always dangerous, and generally harmful. Occasionally they add fertility to the fair fields of jurisprudence, but more often they tend to cut gullies through well-established principles, or to create stagnant ponds of doubt whose mist and malaria are equally dangerous.

The tendency of judges to invade the province of the jury is shown throughout the entire history of the law, and the survival of the system in full vigor as the foundation stone of Anglo-American jurisprudence is in itself the strongest proof of its inherent merit. Courts of equity from the first refused to recognize the system, and we have recently seen to what extent a trial by jury can be evaded by proceedings in injunction and in the nature of contempt. Courts of admiralty, following the principles of the civil law, have also discarded the jury; and it is a significant fact that they also have refused to recognize the doctrine of contributory negligence, always apportioning the damages in proportion to the comparative negligence of the parties. In view of this tendency, this court has felt it its duty more than once to assert the independence of the jury. In Cable v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 892, 900, 29 S. E. 379, the court says: "This court does not favor the growing practice of taking cases from the jury. The jury is a constitutional body, as much so as the court itself, and in the exercise of its peculiar powers of equal responsibility and independence." In State v. Shule, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 153, the court says: "We think there was error in the mode of conducting the trial. . . . There was a departure from the established mode of proceeding, and the wisest policy is to check innovation at once; particularly as in this case it concerns the 'trial by jury' which the 'bill of rights' declares 'ought to remain sacred and inviolable.' . . . The innovation is that, instead of permitting the jury to give their verdict, the court allows a verdict to be entered for them, such as it is to be presumed the court thinks they ought to render, and then they are asked if any of them disagree to it; thus making a verdict for them, unless they are bold enough to stand out against a plain intimation of the opinion of the court." The court then proceeds to lay down the rule substantially as stated in Spruill v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 39. In State v. Allen, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 257, 262, Judge Pearson, speaking for the court, says: "It is our duty to see to it that the trial by jury shall remain 'sacred and inviolable,' and if, upon the circuits, there has grown up any practice encroaching upon the trial by jury as 'heretofore used,' although such practice may, to some extent, have been sanctioned by decisions of this court, it is our duty to put a stop to it; and, while we will not allow a jury to encroach upon the province of the judge,—i. e. to declare and explain the law, and undertake, by an abuse of their power, to decide questions of law, . . . on the other hand, we are equally solicitous to see that the court shall not commit usurpation upon 'the true office and province of the jury.' Repetition of error can never justify the violation of a positive enactment of a statute, much less the infringement of a fundamental principle upon which our social existence is declared to rest. An error may have crept into our practice by reason of the judges not having attached due importance to the distinction between the condition of things in England, whence we are in the habit of taking our notions of law, and the condition of things here, where the trial by jury is protected both by the Constitution and by legislative enactment. A judge is not at liberty to express an opinion as to the sufficiency of the evidence. When there is a defect, or entire absence of evidence, it is his duty so to instruct the jury; but, if there be any competent evidence, relevant and tending to prove the matter in issue, it is 'the true office and province of the jury' to pass upon it, although the evidence may be so slight that anyone will exclaim, 'Certainly no jury will find the fact upon such insufficient evidence.' Still the judge has no right to put his opinion in the way of the free action of the jury, even should he deem it necessary to do so, in order to prevent them from being misled by the arguments of counsel or their own want of apprehension. It is true, juries will sometimes find strange verdicts, acting under the influence of ignorance or of prejudice, but in general juries are honest, and it is considered safer for the lives and property of the people to submit to the inconvenience of particular cases of this kind than in any wise to allow the judge to encroach upon 'the true office and province of the jury.' This partial evil is in a great measure obviated by allowing the judge to grant a new trial in all cases (except where a party is acquitted upon a criminal charge) whenever he thinks the jury have found against the weight of the evidence." I have no apology to make for quoting so much of this opinion. It is a great opinion of a great judge, fully equal in importance to that of Hoke v. Henderson [15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 1, 25 Am. Dec. 677], about which we have recently heard so much. I have given to the latter opinion the deliberate assent of my judgment and my conscience, and have carried it to its fullest legitimate extent. In doing so I have nothing to retract, but I feel equally bound by the underlying principles of State v. Allen. Are the constitutional rights of the officeholder any more sacred than the constitutional guaranties of the citizen? I think not. I understand the opinion of the court to admit that there is sufficient evidence tending to prove the negligence of the defendant, and to base its judgment purely upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, which it presumes to have been shown beyond the possibility of a reasonable doubt. It should be borne in mind that much of the evidence upon which the court apparently relies as showing contributory negligence was brought out by the defendant on cross-examination. That driving a train at a greater rate of speed than that allowed by law is at least evidence of negligence is well settled. In Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 418, 36 L. ed. 489, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 683, the court says: "Indeed, it has been held in many cases that the running of railroad trains within the limits of a city at a rate of speed greater than is allowed by an ordinance of such city is negligence per se [citing authorities]. But perhaps the better and more generally accepted rule is that such an act on the part of the railroad company is always to be considered by the jury as at least a circumstance from which negligence may be inferred in determining whether the company was or was not guilty of negligence." The opinion of the court disposes of the case at bar in the following words: "And it seems to us that there can be no doubt but what the intestate of the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence if the evidence be true, and every word of it believed. This issue is, then, not one that must be found by a jury, but one that may be found by the court. It does not present a question where reasonable men might put different constructions upon it, and come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of negligence." By this I presume the court means that the negligence of the deceased was the ultimate proximate cause. This remarkable finding, coupled with the unqualified assertion that no reasonable man can put a different construction upon it, becomes still more remarkable in view of the fact that two members of this court have put a different construction upon it. This exquisite but unconscious satire upon the rule itself well illustrates its inherent fallacy. I do not mean to be flippant, or to treat the opinion of the court with any disrespect, but surely it is a legitimate argument to show that it necessarily involves a reductio ad absurdum. If reasonable men cannot take a different view of this matter, it follows that the two judges who have taken a different view of it cannot be considered as reasonable men. But suppose two other judges should in some other case have the misfortune to differ from a majority of the court as to the effect of the evidence, they also would come under the ban. This would leave the remaining member of the court far above his associates upon the lonely pedestal of solitary infallibility. Suppose he, too, should fall from his high estate, what would become of the court? And yet this court must say that no reasonable man can draw but one conclusion from the evidence, or the case must go to the jury. Why not let it go to the jury, as was said in Allen's Case should be done, in all cases of doubt? The court is not only putting itself in the place of the jury, but is deciding the case by a majority verdict.

Another exceedingly able and interesting opinion is the dissenting opinion of Justice Bynum in Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C., on page 458. The present attitude of the court renders that opinion almost prophetic. The opinion of the court in the case at bar says that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff must be taken as true, as far as he is concerned. This absolutely reverses the reason of the rule. A party is estopped from impeaching the credibility of his witnesses, but not from denying the correctness of their statements. Moreover, much of the evidence was brought out by the defendant on cross-examination. On a motion for nonsuit, the defendant admits the truth of the plaintiff's evidence, which must be construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. So construing the evidence, can anyone say that, if the engine had been going at not more than 4 miles an hour,—the maximum speed allowed by the ordinance,—the engineer could not have stopped in time to prevent the killing? As the intestate was going in the same direction, if he were walking at the rate of 3 miles an hour, the train would have gained on him only 1 mile in an hour. The intestate is presumed to have known the law, and he had a right to assume that the defendant would obey the law. He had a right to presume that the defendant would give him the ordinary signals required by law, and would not run him down, and crush the life out of him, without giving him some slight warning. Surely, a human life is still worth something,—the pulling of a bell cord, the opening of a whistle. We are constantly told that we should be shocked at the excessive verdicts of juries. That is often the case, but there are other things which also touch my judicial sensibility. A human form mangled beyond recognition, and an immortal spirit hurled into eternity without a moment's warning, are a greater shock to the instructed conscience of a Christian age than any verdict rendering merely pecuniary damages. This may be called mere sentimentality. Be it so. I can never hope to attain that high plane of judicial temperament where I shall be entirely free from human sympathy. In addition to the weight of reason and authority in favor of drawing the line at affirmative verdicts, another advantage is that it is a natural boundary, seen and known of all men. Where the dividing line between great principles is marked by nothing more substantial than stakes, which can easily be put down, and as easily pulled up and moved, the principles themselves are in imminent danger. I deeply feel the importance of this decision, and may overestimate its danger. I hope I do, but it seems to me to involve ultimate results far-reaching and dangerous in their nature.

With such strong convictions and sincere apprehensions, I cannot afford to cast away the moorings of the past, and turn my opinions loose to float without chart or compass, the aimless driftwood of a shoreless sea.

Clark, J., dissenting:

The jury system, whatever its defects, is the best which the wisdom of the ages has yet evolved for the ascertainment of the truth of disputed issues of fact. It is the bulwark of the liberty and the rights of the citizen. The line between the province of the court and of the jury was distinctly run and marked by our ancestors in the act of 1796 (now Code, § 413). Bynum, J., in Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 458, ably and prophetically pointed out the evils of the judiciary passing beyond that line and invading the province of the jury as the sole triors of the facts. It is to be deeply regretted that his views did not then prevail. It is a still further invasion of the province of the jury, and contrary to a long line of the decisions of this court (as Mr. Justice Douglas has shown), to permit a judge to direct an affirmative finding, which is nothing less than the court passing upon the evidence and holding that a fact is sufficiently proved. It is the province of the jury to disbelieve uncontradicted evidence if they attach no faith to the witnesses. If there is no evidence in support of the party having the burden of proof upon an issue, the judge may direct a negative finding for its absence; or, if the uncontradicted evidence is in support of the contention of the party having the burden of proof, the court may tell the jury, "if they believe the evidence," to find in favor of that side; but the judge cannot, even in such case, direct an affirmative finding, for that is to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, which the jury alone is authorized to do.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

v.
Alphonzo J. LIBBY et al.

(93 Me. 575.)

The death of a stallion, preventing an exercise of the privilege of return by one who had paid for a fruitless service, with an agreement for the privilege of return during the season, does not create any failure of consideration which will give a right to repayment..

(February 3, 1900.)

NOTE.—As to effect of intervening impossibility of performance upon the liability for breach of contract, see Stewart v. Stone (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 215, and note; and Remy v. Olds (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. 645.

A GREED statement for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court in an action to recover back money paid for the services of a stallion which died before the service was completed. Judgment for defendants.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Beane & Beane, for plaintiff:

If the agreement is for an act which the party alone can perform, and he is prevented by the act of God, the obligation is discharged; but if the stipulations can be substantially performed, he is not excused.

Was it not incumbent upon the defendants, if they were to make this answer, to show that Arrival was not overworked or overdriven,—that God, and not the defendants, caused his death; that they were not negligent in his treatment, but used due care and diligence, proper medicine and appliances, for his recovery?

Mr. A. M. Spear, for defendants:

In the light of the facts as understood by the parties, and fairly interpreted, the privilege of return was, as a legal proposition, incidental to the main contract, and contingent entirely upon future events, to wit, the necessity of a return and the ability and existence of the stallion to perform the service.

Sickness and death of the stallion before the privilege of return was requested bring the defendants fully within the protection of the law.

Elliot Nat. Bank v. Beal, 141 Mass. 570, 6 N. E. 742; Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 Best & S. 826; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 516.

The agreed statement does not show or claim that it was the fault of defendants that the stallion died. Hence no presumption of fault on the part of the defendants arises, but rather a presumption of the exercise of due care.

Beaulieu v. Portland Co. 48 Me. 291; Robinson v. Fitchburg & W. R. Co. 7 Gray, 92.

This contract was for the service of a particular horse, of particular merit, and particular pedigree. Could the defendants have compelled the plaintiff to accept the services of another stallion? We think not when the converse is true.

Marvel v. Phillips, 162 Mass. 399, 26 L. R. A. 416, 38 N. E. 1117.

The death of the stallion excused any further performance of the contract on the part of the defendants, and leaves no right of recovery of damages on the part of the plaintiff.

Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 519, 12 L. R. A. 571, 27 N. E. 667.

Mr. O. B. Clason also for defendants.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff agreed to pay the defendants $75 for the service of their stallion to a valuable mare owned by him, "with the privilege of return for the season." At the time of the service the plaintiff gave to the defendants his negotiable promissory note for the sum of $75 in full payment of the contract price. But the service proved fruitless, and the exercise of the "privilege of return" was prevented by the sickness and death of the stallion. In the meantime the plaintiff's note had been discounted at a bank in the regular course of business, and, after it had been merged in a judgment of the court, was duly paid.

The plaintiff now brings this action to recover the amount paid by him under this contract on the ground of a want or failure of consideration.

It is the opinion of the court that upon the facts presented in the agreed statement the action is not maintainable.

It should be observed, in the first place, that this is not a contract of warranty, but for a service "with the privilege of return," for which he was to pay $75. This sum was not to be divided and made payable in two instalments, one for the service and another for the "privilege of return," or in a specified instalment for each service. The consideration was entire, and the plaintiff unhesitatingly gave his negotiable note for the full 49 L. R. A.

amount of the contract price at the time of the service. This note was presumptively payment. It was equivalent to cash, and the fact that the plaintiff was willing to give it has much significance upon the precise understanding of the parties in relation to this contract. By reason of his knowledge of the breeding qualities of the mare, the plaintiff apparently decided that it was not for his interest to pay the price of a contract of warranty, but preferred to pay the price of a service with the privilege of return; and from his readiness to pay the entire sum at the time the contract was made it is evident that the service actually obtained at that time was deemed by him the most important and substantial feature of the contract. In the event that this service proved fruitless, he had the "privilege of return" for further service. But it would seem that the plaintiff did not consider it probable that he would have occasion to exercise the privilege. It is obvious that that part of the contract by which one service of the stallion was actually obtained was considered positive and absolute. It depended upon no contingency. But the "privilege of return for the season" was not absolute and unconditional. It necessarily contemplated the continued existence of the stallion, and it is a settled rule of law that "in contracts from the nature of which it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that, if the performance become impossible from the perishing of the person or thing, that shall excuse such performance." 2 Chitty, Contr. 11th Am. ed. 1076; Knight v. Bean, 22 Me. 531; Marvel v. Phillips, 162 Mass. 399, 26 L. R. A. 416, 38 N. E. 1117, and cases cited; Spalding v. Rosa, 71 N. Y. 40, 27 Am. Rep. 7; Yerrington v. Greene, 7 R. I. 589, 84 Am. Dec. 578; Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 Best & S. 826. The plaintiff was absolutely assured of one service before the payment of the contract price, but the right to further service was contingent upon the life of the stallion. There was no guaranty that the horse would live through the season.

The plaintiff does not controvert this familiar principle. He does not deny "that in this case the death of the stallion excused exact or full performance" of the contract. He does not claim that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover damages for the non-fulfilment of it. But he insists that the death of the stallion did not relieve the defendants from the obligation either to return the money to the plaintiff, or give him a substantial performance of the contract by furnishing the service of some other stallion.

The agreement between these parties was analogous to a contract for personal services involving the exercise of individual skill and judgment, which can be performed only by the person named. Such contracts are not deemed to be of absolute obligation, but are subject to an implied condition that the person shall be alive and able to perform the services at the time required. Dickey v. Linscott, 20 Me. 453, 37 Am. Dec. 66; Green- leaf v. Grounder, 86 Me. 298, 29 Atl. 1082; Spalding v. Rosa, 71 N. Y. 40, 27 Am. Rep. 7; Marvel v. Phillips, 162 Mass. 399, 26 L. R. A. 416, 38 N. E. 1117.

In the last-named case the court says: "A contract to render such services and perform such duties is subject to the implied condition that the party shall be alive and well enough in health to perform it. Death or a disability which renders performance impossible discharges the contract. Neither Phillips nor his estate is bound to furnish a substitute, nor is the plaintiff bound to accept one."

The plaintiff doubtless preferred the defendants' stallion because his pedigree, record, and peculiar merits seemed best calculated to accomplish the purpose in breeding contemplated by him. He contracted for the service of a particular stallion, and could not be compelled to accept the services of any other. The defendants contracted to furnish the services of their stallion, and not the services of any other. Nor does it anywhere appear in the statement of facts that there was ever any suggestion or intimation from the plaintiff that he desired or would accept the service of any other stallion in lieu of that one selected by him.

There is a class of cases represented by Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517, 12 L. R. A. 571, 27 N. E. 667, in which it is held that, if one contracts to furnish labor and material in the construction of a building, and his contract becomes impossible of performance on account of the destruction of the building, he may recover pro rata for what he has done or furnished; and, on the other hand, that the owner of the building, who has made payments in advance, in such a case may recover back so much of his money as was an overpayment. But this doctrine is clearly inapplicable to the case at bar. As before stated, the contract price was indivisible, and incapable of apportionment. The payment made by the plaintiff cannot, upon the facts of this case, be fairly deemed an overpayment. If, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to recover anything, it must be the full amount of the contract price. But this would be unjust to the defendants. It is true the service actually had was ineffectual, and of no value to the plaintiff. But non constat that the privilege of return would have been of any value. The defendants made no engagement of warranty that any service would be successful.

The absolute part of the contract was executed by the voluntary act of the plaintiff in giving his negotiable note for the contract price, and the contingent part became impossible of performance. The entry must therefore be:

Judgment for defendants.

STATE of Maryland, Appt.,

v.

William H. KNOWLES.

(.....Md.....)

1. In construing a statute in which a word susceptible of more than one meaning is repeated in different parts of the act, a presumption arises that it is used in the same sense throughout; but the presumption falls where such a construction will nullify the law, if this result can be avoided by any fair and reasonable construction of the whole act.
2. The word "may" in an act creating a board of dental examiners, and providing that a graduate from a university or college authorized to grant diplomas in dental surgery may be examined by such board with reference to qualifications, will be construed "must," since the duty of examination is for the benefit of both the public and the applicant.
3. Discrimination in favor of the graduates of a regular college of dentistry, in a statute requiring graduates of other universities or colleges authorized to grant diplomas in dental surgery to be examined with reference to qualifications, is not an arbitrary and unconstitutional discrimination, in violation of U. S. Const. 14th Amend. and Md. Declaration of Rights, art. 23.

4. A statute providing that any person desiring to practise dentistry may be examined "with reference to qualifications" by the board of medical examiners will not be held unconstitutional on the ground that its language is so vague and indeterminate as to permit an examination upon any subject, since it will be presumed that the qualifications only referred to are those appropriate to, and requisite for, the practice of dentistry.

5. An exception in a statute after general words of prohibition is matter of defense, which must be interposed by the accused in a prosecution for a violation of the statute, and need not be negated by the indictment.

APPPEAL by the state from a judgment of the Criminal Court of Baltimore City in favor of defendant in a proceeding against him for practising dentistry without a certificate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Isidor Rayner, Attorney General, and E. P. Keech, Jr., for appellant:

It is too late in these days to deny the power of the legislatures of the various states to enact statutes regulating the conduct of those businesses, trades, and professions which have primarily to do with the public health or welfare.

Re Taylor, 48 Md. 28, 30 Am. Rep. 451; McAllister v. State, 72 Md. 390, 20 Atl. 142; Singer v. State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L. R. A. 551, 19 Atl. 1044; State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L. R. A. 433, 43 Atl. 771; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231; Williams v. Mississippi, 170 U. S. 213, 42 L. ed. 1012, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 583; State v. Randolph, 23 Or. 74, 17 L. R. A. 470, 31 Pac. 201; Schoolcraft v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 92 Ky. 233, sub nom. Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 14 L. R. A. 579, 17 S. W. 567.

The courts, in construing a statute, will hold that "may" is equivalent to the word "shall" or "must," whenever reason or the necessities of the case so require.

Sifford v. Morrison, 63 Md. 14; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 306; Smith, Const. & Stat. Constr. pp. 724 et seq.; Maxwell, Interpretation of Statutes, pp. 286 et seq.

In permitting its board of examiners to waive the requirement of examination, the state has not added to the burdens of the appellee or any other applicant of registration. But it has vested in the board of examiners the power to employ other means to satisfy itself of the competency of the applicant, of the sufficiency of which the board is the only judge.

Iowa Electric Medical College Asso. v. Schrader, 87 Iowa, 659, 20 L. R. A. 355, 55 N. W. 24; Williams v. Dental Examiners, 93 Tenn. 619, 27 S. W. 1019; State v. Creditor, 44 Kan. 565, 24 Pac. 346; Hewitt v. Charier, 16 Pick. 353.

The qualifications referred to must be those reasonably necessary to the proper knowledge and practice of the profession of dental surgery.

Smith, Const. & Stat. Constr. p. 656; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 400 et seq., 532; Maxwell, Interpretation of Statutes, pp. 396 et seq. See also note to Alexander v. Worthington, 5 Md. 471; Knuckles v. State, 87 Md. 204, 39 Atl. 619.

What the subjects necessary to a proper knowledge to pursue the profession of dentistry are the legislature, in its wisdom, has left to its technically trained board of examiners, who must, by the very terms of the act, be dentists of experience.

A possible evil resulting from a discretion conferred upon a public officer is no ground for holding a statute to be unconstitutional and void as denying equal protection of the laws of the state to all its citizens, when no abuse or illegal exercise of the discretion has been shown to exist.

Williams v. Mississippi, 170 U. S. 213, 42 L. ed. 1012, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 583; Hiss v. Baltimore & H. Pass. R. Co. 52 Md. 242, 36 Am. Rep. 371.

The nature and extent of the qualifications required must depend primarily upon the judgment of the state as to their necessity. If they are appropriate to the calling or profession, and attainable by reasonable application, no objection to their validity can be raised.

State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L. R. A. 551, 19 Atl. 1044; Gosnell v. State, 52 Ark. 228, 12 S. W. 392.

The legislature may adopt more than one standard of competency or method of ascertaining it.

Hewitt v. Charier, 16 Pick. 353; Williams v. People, 121 Ill. 84, 11 N. E. 881; State v. Creditor, 44 Kan. 565, 24 Pac. 346; State v. Vandersluis, 42 Minn. 129, 6 L. R. A. 119, 43 N. W. 789.

Mr. Albert S. J. Owens, for appellee:

The general rule of law as to the degree of proficiency required of professional persons in their dealings with the public, the lack of which in any case submitted to their care will impose liability, is that the person assuming to practise shall possess and exercise as much knowledge and skill in any given case as are possessed by the average person in the particular profession.

It is certainly beyond the power of a legislative body to delegate, without the slightest attempt to control, the authority to fix the limits of an examination for admission to practise dentistry, to the whim and caprice of an irresponsible and arbitrary discretion.

Pearce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee was indicted in the criminal court of Baltimore city under the act of 1896 (chap. 378), which repealed and reenacted, with amendments, article 32 of the Code of Public General Laws of Maryland, entitled Dentistry. He demurred to the indictment upon the ground that the act is unconstitutional. The demurrer was sustained, the indictment was quashed, and the state has appealed.

The act mentioned created a state dental board of examiners, consisting of six members, charged with the duty of issuing certificates to those entitled under the act to practise dentistry in the state. The 5th and 12th sections alone concern this appeal, and these are as follows:

"Sec. 5. Any person twenty-one years of age, who has graduated at, and holds a diploma from, a university or college authorized to grant diplomas in dental surgery by the laws of any one of the United States, and who is desirous of practising dentistry in this state, may be examined by said board with reference to qualifications, and after passing an examination satisfactory to the board, his or her name, residence, or place of business, shall be registered in a book kept for that purpose, and a certificate shall be issued to such person. Any graduate of a regular college of dentistry may, at the discretion of the examining board, be registered without being subjected to an examination."

"Sec. 12. Nothing in this article shall be so construed as to interfere with the rights and privileges of resident physicians and surgeons, or with persons holding certificates duly issued to them prior to the passage of this act; and dental students operating under the immediate supervision of their instructors in dental infirmaries or dental schools chartered by the state of Maryland."

This act is assailed on the ground that it violates the 23d article of the Maryland Declaration of Rights and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The contention is twofold, viz.: (1) That the board may, if it chooses, refuse to examine one holding a diploma from a college or university authorized to grant diplomas in dental surgery, and can thus arbitrarily deny the right to practise dentistry in this state, to anyone holding such diploma, however skilled in his profession, or however qualified to pass an examination; and that as the test of constitutionality is, not what has been, but what may be, done or refused under the law, this grant of arbitrary power to do or to refuse to do must invalidate the law. And (2) that the language of the act, "may be examined with reference to qualifications," is so vague and indeterminate as to permit an examination upon any subject which the whim, caprice, or hostility of the board may suggest, and thus again confer upon the board unreasonable and arbitrary power, equally fatal to the validity of the law. If either of these contentions were well founded, we should be compelled to pronounce the law unconstitutional, because we are in hearty accord with the declarations of the Supreme Court of the United States in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064, that, "when we consider the nature and theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power." But we cannot deduce a grant of arbitrary power from any reasonable construction of the language of this act. Upon the first point of the appellee his position is that, as the word "may" occurs twice in § 5, and as there can be no question that in the later clause it is employed in its usual and natural sense, the same sense is necessarily and unalterably impressed upon its employment in the former clause. But he has produced no authority for this position, and we do not think any satisfactory reason can be given for announcing so inexorable a rule of construction. It may, indeed, well be conceded that, where a word susceptible of more than one meaning is repeated in the same act or section of an act (either meaning being in each case open to reasonable adoption), a presumption arises, more or less forcible according to the circumstances, that it is used throughout in the same sense; but where the subject-matter to which the word refers is not the same in both clauses, or where the surrounding circumstances are different, this presumption must yield to an adverse presumption, furnished by an analysis of the various purposes of the law, and of the language in which those purposes are expressed. Now, it is too plain for controversy that the appellee is correct in saying that the last "may" is used in a permissive sense, because it is expressly coupled with "discretion," which negatives the possibility of its use in a mandatory sense. But, if the same sense is to be impressed upon its use in the preceding clause, the result will be to nullify the law; and this result cannot be tolerated if it can be avoided by any fair and reasonable construction of the whole section. In order to reach such fair and reasonable construction, let us suppose for a moment the latter clause to be eliminated from the law. How, then, would the word "may" in the former clause be understood? Would it not necessarily be construed "shall" or "must," in conformity with the established rule of law that where the duty to be performed is for the benefit of the public or third persons it shall be so construed? The duty of examination upon application (where there is no express discretion to waive examination) is for the benefit of both the public and the applicant,—for the benefit of the public, because it protects the public against ignorant and incompetent practitioners; and for the benefit of the qualified applicant, because it puts him before the public with the seal of approbation from a competent and disinterested tribunal. The origin and development of this elementary rule is clearly set forth in Sifford v. Morrison, 63 Md. 18, and many of the cases are there cited in which it has been recognized and applied.

Having determined the construction proper to be adopted if the former clause of the section stood alone, let us now restore the latter clause, and see if the conclusion reached can be thereby in any manner affected. For the reason already stated, it is impossible that "may" can in the latter clause be construed "shall," no matter how the former "may" is construed; and if, merely because this cannot be done, we are compelled to construe "may" in the former clause as used in a permissive sense, we shall be deliberately rejecting the meaning which an established rule of law and the plain purposes of the act require us to adopt in construing the former clause of the section. The law does not permit itself to be frightened out of its propriety by the hobgoblin of inconsistency, and we have no hesitation in holding that the only discretion conferred is to waive an examination when the applicant is a graduate of a regular college of dentistry, and that in all other cases covered by the act examinations must be granted when application is made in accordance with reasonable rules as to time and place. We think the act does mean to distinguish, for the purpose of examinations, between "a college or university authorized to grant diplomas in dental surgery and "a regular college of dentistry." In the former, dentistry may be but an adjunct to the course, and there is no such assurance of thoroughness of instruction and practical application, as must be presumed in a regular dental college, where the whole time of the students and instructors is given to the theory and practice of dental science. Discriminations of this character have been sustained in Williams v. Dental Examiners, 93 Tenn. 619, 27 S. W. 1019, and in State v. Creditor, 44 Kan. 568, 24 Pac. 346; and the exact principle upon which these discriminations rest has been recognized in State v. Vandersluis, 42 Minn. 129, 6 L. R. A. 119, 43 N. W. 789, and in numerous cases where the authority to determine what colleges are "reputable and in good standing" has been held not to be an arbitrary or unreasonable authority.

Upon the second point little need be said. The language of the act might well have been more specific, but it is impossible to suppose that it refers to any other qualifications than those appropriate to and requisite for the practice of dentistry. To hold that this language would permit an examination in astronomy, classics, mathematics, or even in the kindred study of medicine, would be to adopt a forced and violent construction of the law, not for the purpose of sustaining, but defeating, it. The constitutionality of the act was not assailed on any other grounds than those we have considered, nor can we perceive how it could be otherwise successfully assailed, in view of the numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, where similar statutes have been held to violate no constitutional requirement. There is no stronger or clearer exposition of the law applicable to this case than that contained in the following passage from the much-cited and oft-approved case of Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231: "The nature and extent of the qualifications required must depend primarily upon the judgment of the state as to their necessity. If they are appropriate to the calling or profession, and attainable by reasonable study or application, no objection to their validity can be raised because of their stringency or difficulty. It is only when they have no relation to such calling or profession, or are unattainable by such reasonable study and application, that they can operate to deprive one of his right to pursue a lawful vocation." In Singer v. State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L. R. A. 551, 19 Atl. 1044, this court, in sustaining the act of 1886 (chapter 439) regulating the business of plumbers in Baltimore city, adopted the language last quoted, and added: "No one questions the right of every person in this country to follow any legitimate business or occupation he may see fit. This is a privilege open alike to everyone. His own labor, and the right to use it as a means of livelihood, is a right as sacred, and as fully protected by the law, as any other personal or private right. But, broad and comprehensive as this right may be, it is subject to the paramount right, inherent in every government, to impose such restraint and to provide such regulations in regard to the pursuits of life as the public welfare may require." The most recent expression of this court upon this subject is in the case of State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L. R. A. 433, 43 Atl. 771, sustaining the act creating a state live-stock sanitary board, from which the following passage may be appropriately reproduced: "If the legislature of Maryland has by the statute under consideration made a class to which the provisions of the act were designed to apply, and if that classification is just and reasonable, and not purely arbitrary, the ruling on the demurrer [sustaining it] was wrong." The same reasons which apply to the profession of medicine apply with equal force to the profession of dentistry, which is but a special branch of the medical profession. State v. Vandersluis, 42 Minn. 130, 6 L. R. A. 119, 43 N. W. 789; Gosnell v. State, 52 Ark. 231, 12 S. W. 392; Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A., note, p. 581.

We were informed at the argument in this court that the learned judge of the criminal court expressed himself as being clearly of the opinion that the statute is a valid exercise of the legislative power, and that he sustained the demurrer only on the ground that the indictment does not negative the exception contained in the 12th section of the statute,—a ground not relied on by the appellee's counsel either below or in this court. The rule that where, after general words of prohibition, an exception is created in a subsequent clause or section, it must be interposed by the accused as matter of defense, is too firmly settled in this state to be questioned. Stearns v. State, 81 Md. 344, 32 Atl. 252; Kiefer v. State, 87 Md. 562, 40 Atl. 377. For the reasons stated, the judgment will be reversed, and the case will be remanded for a new trial.

1. Officers of a bank will be presumed to have had knowledge of its insolvent condition at the time of certain payments to them, attacked as unlawful preferences, where the bank had been insolvent for many years, and became hopelessly insolvent the day following the payments.

NOTE.—As to unlawful preference by insolvent bank, see Elmira Sav. Bank v. Davis (N. Y.) 25 L. R. A. 546, and note (this case was reversed in 40 L. ed. 700); also O'Brien v. Grant (N. Y.) 28 L. R. A. 361; and O'Brien v. East River Bridge Co. (N. Y.) 48 L. R. A. 122.

2. The claim that a bill for a receivership was not filed under Code Gen. Pub. Laws, art. 23, §§ 264, 264a, relating to the dissolution and winding up of insolvent corporations, and that therefore the court had no jurisdiction to decree dissolution, cannot be set up by the officers of the corporation to defeat an action by the receivers against them to recover the amount of unlawful preferences, where the decree was made at their instance, and provides that the estate and assets of the corporation shall be administered according to the insolvent law, and that the receivers shall have the same powers as to setting aside illegal preferences which are thereby given to permanent trustees.

3. Payment by an insolvent bank of a check of a company in which the president of the bank holds most of the stock, and of a note on which its directors are indorsers, although it has not committed the formal act of insolvency, will be held to be an unlawful preference, whether the estate be administered in equity or under the insolvent law, and will be set aside in an action by receivers appointed under Code Gen. Pub. Laws, art. 23, relating to the dissolution of insolvent corporations, art. 47, § 22, of which prohibits preferences made when insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency.

A PPEALS by defendants from decrees of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover assets of the insolvent bank. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Robert H. Smith and Gans & Haman, for appellants:

If a payment, assignment, or conveyance is to be declared void as a preference on the ground of insolvency, it must be by reason of commercial insolvency, which does not mean inadequacy of aggregate assets to balance aggregate liabilities, but "inability to pay debts when due in ordinary course of business."

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions we are to consider grow out of the failure of the South Baltimore Bank, which, by a decree of the circuit court of Baltimore city, passed on the 1st of June, 1898, was declared insolvent, and dissolved. By the decree just mentioned the appellees Messrs. Colton and Schott were appointed receivers, with the usual powers given to such officers, and also with power to wind up, under the court's direction, the affairs of the bank, in conformity with the provisions of article 23 of the Code of Public General Laws in so far as the same apply to the liquidation of the affairs of insolvent corporations through the agency of receivers, and to that end they were authorized to exercise and have "all the title, power, and authority" which it is declared by the said provisions of article 23 shall be conferred upon or vested in receivers appointed by the court of the estate or effects of corporations. In the exercise of the powers thus conferred upon them they brought two suits in the same court by the decree of which they were appointed; one against the James Clark Company, a body corporate, and Winfield S. Cahill, and the other against Cahill, Norman H. Storey, and Walter L. Denny. The first bill asked that the payment of a check of the James Clark Company on the South Baltimore Bank for $10,000 be declared a fraudulent preference, and the prayer of the second bill was to the same effect in reference to the payment of a note of said bank for $5,000, held by the Citizens' National Bank, and indorsed by Cahill, Storey, and Denny. The defendants named in both bills answered, fully denying all fraud. Testimony was taken, and the court below found that both these payments were unlawful and fraudulent preferences. A decree was passed accordingly (the two cases having been consolidated by the agreement of 49 I. R. A.

There are but three questions in the case, only two of which require consideration, although at the hearing a number of other questions were discussed in a most interesting and able manner. The questions we are to consider are whether, under all the circumstances of this case, the payments above referred to were made by the South Baltimore Bank—that is to say, by its officers and agents—at a time when it was insolvent, and about to close its doors; secondly, whether the payments thus made, when the corporation was insolvent in fact, by such officers, of their own claims, to the exclusion of and to the detriment of other creditors of the bank are unlawful preferences within the meaning of the insolvent law; and, third, whether, apart from the insolvent law and §§ 264, 264a, art. 23, Code, the payments made under the circumstances these were made will be declared by a court of equity to be consistent with a fair, equitable, and just distribution of the assets of an insolvent corporation.

The first question is one entirely of fact, and is fully answered in the affirmative by the testimony. Indeed, it is conceded all the way through the case that the bank had been insolvent for several years. The evidence shows without contradiction that, in addition to this long-continued state of insolvency, the bank became hopelessly insolvent at the time when these payments were made, or immediately following thereupon. There is no denial of either condition of insolvency; but the officers, especially the defendants Cahill, Storey, and Denny, who got the benefit of the payments, place their defense on their denial of knowledge of the bank's insolvency. We are forced to the conclusion, however, that, if the bank is conceded to have been insolvent for years, its officers must have known it, and that, if it was hopelessly insolvent on the 23d, they knew, or ought to have known, it on the preceding business day, when the payments were made. We have not overlooked the fact that Mr. Cahill and his co-indorsers have denied that they had any knowledge of the insolvency of his bank at the time the payments were made. The fact that he was, as he said, only president in name, may, to some extent, account for his want of that accurate knowledge which he should have had. As president and director of such a financial institution, the law imputes the requisite knowledge, and neither he nor they can be given on account of their wilful ignorance a better standing that they would have had if they had performed their duties. Corbett v. Woodward, 5 Sawy. 416, Fed. Cas. No. 3,223; McDaniel v. Harvey, 51 Mo. App. 205; Sicardi v. Keystone Oil Co. 149 Pa. 148, 24 Atl. 164; Lowry Bkg. Co. v. Empire Lumber Co. 91 Ga. 624, 17 S. E. 968; Roan v. Winn, 93 Mo. 511, 4 S. W. 736.

2. It was urged with a good deal of force that the bill which was filed in the original case in which receivers were appointed and dissolution decreed, and under which proceedings were first commenced against the South Baltimore Bank, was not filed under the provisions of §§ 264, 264a, art. 23, relating to the dissolution and winding up of insolvent corporations; that, therefore, the court below had no jurisdiction to decree dissolution, and that the insolvent law has no application to this case. Section 264, just referred to, provides that "whenever any corporation in this state shall have been determined by legal proceedings to be insolvent, or shall be proven to be insolvent by proof offered under any bill filed under the provisions of this section, it shall be deemed to have surrendered its corporate rights, . . . and may be adjudged to be dissolved after hearing, according to the practice of courts of equity in this state, upon a bill filed for that purpose," etc. And § 264a, among other things, provides "that whenever such corporation shall have been adjudged to be dissolved as provided in the next preceding section of this article, all of its property . . . shall be distributed . . . in the same manner" as is required by our insolvent laws (Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 47). And this section further provides that the receivers so appointed of such corporations shall have the same powers to bring suits and to set aside transfers, payments, and preferences made by the corporation, or by any of its officers on its behalf, as the permanent trustee of a natural person who is an insolvent debtor has under the insolvent law of this state. It was contended that the bill in the original case does not specifically ask for dissolution, and that, therefore, it must be held not to have been filed either for that purpose or under the sections mentioned. It does, however, ask, not only for the appointment of receivers, but also that the bank (a corporation) be declared insolvent. It prays for the "winding up" of the corporation by the distribution of its assets among the stockholders should anything remain after the payment of debts, and for general relief. The act of 1896 (chapter 349) was passed to bring corporations within the provisions of the insolvent law, and to give courts of equity power to declare them insolvent, and dissolve them. But, as we have said, the decree shows the purpose of the bill. But, aside from any other view, it would seem to be beyond the power of these defendants in this case to deny the validity of the decree dissolving the South Baltimore Bank. It is true they do not make a direct attack upon the decree, nor deny the jurisdiction of the court to pass it. But the contention is that the bill was not filed for dissolution nor for winding up under §§ 264, 264a, art. 23, and that, therefore, the court was without jurisdiction to entertain this bill, and hence the insolvent law has no application. The decree, however, provides that the estate and assets of the bank shall be administered according to that law, and that the receivers shall have the same powers as to setting aside illegal preferences which are thereby given to permanent trustees. Now for the first time it is suggested that the dissolution decree is not to have full force and effect. No such suggestion was made when that decree was before us in the case of Colton v. Drover's Perpetual Bldg. & Loan Asso. 90 Md. 85, 46 L. R. A. 388, 45 Atl. 23, and Colton v. Mayer, 90 Md. 711, 45 Atl. 874. On the contrary, the receivers relied upon that decree to show that the extent of their powers was the same as that of permanent trustees under the insolvent law; and in the former case the opinions of this court assume that the proceedings were under § 264a, and in the latter declare that the receivers were acting under that section. Indeed, ever since the date of that decree—June 1, 1898—declaring the South Baltimore Bank insolvent and dissolved, its affairs and estate have been administered by the receivers without objection from any quarter under the provisions of the insolvent law. It is perfectly obvious that all interested were in fact acting under the provisions of §§ 264, 264a. The decree is conclusive upon this point. It was passed without objection, if not with the implied consent of all parties. If the intention had been unquestioned to proceed under those sections, and counsel had been instructed so to file the bill, but had omitted to add the three words "they pray dissolution," can it be supposed for a moment that any serious difficulty would have arisen from this omission? If attention had been called to it in the court below, the bill would have been amended in that respect. No objection on the ground of defective averments of the bill, nor any objections based on want of jurisdiction, could have been taken in this court by the defendant. In addition to this, if the bill now before us be regarded, as we think it may be, as a bill filed to carry into execution the dissolution decree, the law of the latter is not examinable, and will be enforced unless attacked by bill of review. Tomlinson v. McKaig, 5 Gill. 256-278. We do not, therefore, feel inclined favorably to consider this question of jurisdiction, presented as it is in this collateral way at this late day, and by some of the parties, too, at whose instance the decree now objected to was passed. In Hayes v. Brotzman, 46 Md. 519, it was contended, as in the case at bar, that it did not appear from the record that the bill was filed under the provisions of the general incorporation law (Acts 1868, chap. 471), and that, therefore, the receivers could not rely upon § 195 of that act (now codified as § 274 of article 23, Code) for authority to sue; but this court said that the order of the circuit court appointing receivers of the property and effects of that corporation, being the order of a court of competent jurisdiction to pass it, carried with it the presumption of regularity. Unless, therefore, the decree appointing these receivers and declaring the bank insolvent be successfully attacked in some direct and proper way other than in this collateral manner, it must stand, and these appellees have a right to rely upon § 174, which expressly provides that receivers appointed as they were, and with the powers they have, shall have authority to sue in their own names. In the case just cited it was held, therefore, that whether the order appointing the receivers authorized them to sue or not was immaterial, for their authority to do so is ample under § 195, chap. 471, of the act of 1868, which is the same as § 174 of article 23 of the Code. But, in addition to this, the decree we are considering declares they shall have "all the title, power, and authority" which, by the provisions of article 23, are conferred upon or vested in receivers appointed by the court of the estate or effects of corporations. See also § 239 of article 23. If, therefore, the decree stands, then, under § 264a, these receivers have authority to maintain suits to set aside preferences by insolvent corporations in the same manner and to the same extent as the insolvent law gives to the permanent trustee of a natural person who is an insolvent debtor. It can hardly be contended that the preferences which are here so earnestly defended would be held valid under the provisions of § 22 of article 47, which prohibits preferences of every kind made when insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency. The fact that the bank, which is conceded to have been insolvent for several years, and shown to have been hopelessly insolvent the day after the payments, had not actually suspended payment of its negotiable paper, and therefore had not committed that act of insolvency, has no tendency to prove that it had not made any of the unlawful preferences prohibited by law. The case of Gaslight Improv. Co. v. Terrell, L. R. 10 Eq. 175, bears directly upon this aspect of the case, for the English statutes in respect to unlawful preferences are very similar to the provisions of our insolvent law, which, as we have seen, are adopted by § 264a of article 23. In disposing of this case Lord Romilly, M. R., said: "The directors of the company think fit to pay themselves. It is to be observed that the directors of every company who are also creditors fill two distinct and antagonistic characters. In the first place, they are trustees for the benefit of the company, and are trustees for the creditors to this extent;—that they are bound to apply all the assets for the benefit of the creditors as far as they will extend. They themselves are also creditors, and have an interest to have their own debts paid. Now, if they had themselves passed a resolution . . . to pay A. B., who was not a director, but a stranger to the company, nobody, in my opinion, would be found to assert that that was not a fraudulent preference, the creditor having done nothing, having made no application for the payment. Is the case altered by the fact that the creditor is one of the directors? So far from that being the case, in my opinion it only adds a breach of trust to the fraudulent preference." It will be observed that the conclusion reached by Lord Romilly in the above case is not based on the so-called "trust-fund doctrine" as adopted in this state (Fear v. Bartlett, 81 Md. 435, 33 L. R. A. 721, 32 Atl. 322), by which it is held that when a corporation has been dissolved, or has committed an act which by law is an act of insolvency, its entire property becomes a trust fund for the payment of its creditors in preference to the claims of stockholders.

3. This brings us to a consideration of the merits of the case. We are not willing to adopt the view, which was so forcibly presented, that the payments here attacked as fraudulent preferences are free from fraud, and should be protected by a court of equity. On the contrary, our view is that whether the estate of the insolvent bank be administered under the insolvent law or according to the rules which govern courts of equity is immaterial, for, in either case, as we have seen, the rule of distribution is the same, and that rule requires fairness and equality, and prohibits favor and preference. Assuming, therefore, that we have already shown that these payments were made to the officers of the bank when it was insolvent, and about to close its doors, and that, therefore, they are illegal preferences under the insolvent law, we will proceed to discuss the question whether, apart from the insolvent law, a court of equity will recognize them as fair and equitable payments. In the case of Finch Mfg. Co. v. Stirling Co. 187 Pa. 596, 41 Atl. 204, decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1898, the preferred creditor, as in the case before us, was a president and director in both the debtor and creditor corporations. The court said: "Although hampered by debts, it did not follow that the company was insolvent. Statutory insolvency is generally determined as an inability to pay debts when due or demandable; but the rule that an officer or director of an insolvent corporation cannot prefer his individual debt is based, not on statutory insolvency, but on the unfair and fraudulent character of the transaction. He is a trustee of the corporate property for the benefit of all creditors and stockholders, and has superior knowledge of the financial condition of his company. It would be highly unjust to permit him to use his position for his individual interest to the prejudice of others." Before proceeding further with the discussion of this branch of the case, it must be remembered that it is a conceded fact that when Mr. Schott examined the statement of the affairs of the bank on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 23d of February, he found it hopelessly insolvent. It is also conceded that it had been in an insolvent condition for several years. This being so, it is useless to consume time to show the condition of the bank when the payments were made, and it follows that its then condition must have been known to its officers when Mr. Cahill took care of himself and his friends and co-indorsers. Mr. Cahill was practically the owner of the James Clark Company, as he owned all except four shares of its stock, which four shares were in the hands of others in order to have a legal organization. If there was any difference as to the degree of insolvency of the bank between the 21st February, when the payments were made, and the succeeding business day, when it is conceded to have been hopelessly insolvent, that difference must have been caused by the withdrawal of over $15,000 by Mr. Cahill to make the payments just mentioned. In the case of Fear v. Bartlett, 81 Md. 435, 33 L. R. A. 721, 32 Atl. 322, it is said that, "so long as the company is a going concern, having the possession and management of its property, contracts made by and with the company are governed by the same principles of law as contracts between individuals." And again it is said that the trust-fund doctrine has no application until proceedings in insolvency have been instituted, or some act done that in law is regarded as an act of insolvency. If the conclusion we have already reached be correct, namely, that the bank was insolvent at the time the payments were made, such payments must, we think, be regarded as unlawful preferences, and therefore as acts of insolvency. As we have seen, it is conceded the bank was and had been insolvent for some years, yet it is denied that this condition was known to its officers, and that, therefore, it was impossible for them to have violated the law. But we think the evidence shows the very payments here objected to were made in contemplation of insolvency, not, perhaps, of the mild type of insolvency which appears to have been the normal condition of this bank, but in contemplation of that hopeless insolvency which supervened upon, and was doubtless caused by, the payments. In the case of Van Wageningen v. Paterson Sav. Bank, 10 N. J. Eq. 16, the chancellor says in regard to similar preferences: "If the legality of this transaction can be maintained, then it follows that, after a bank has become so hopelessly insolvent that the directors have been forced to the conclusion that it is incumbent upon them at once to close the doors of the bank, and abandon the objects for which the institution was incorporated, they may employ the last half hour of existence in parceling out to favorite creditors the few remaining assets of the bank still within their control. Nay, it follows that the cashier of the bank may, after the directors have declared the bank insolvent, and have determined to notify the public of its insolvency, before the directors can reach the door to post up such notice, dispose of the assets at his pleasure to the creditors of the bank. For this is not the case contended for by counsel that the cashier of a bank may lawfully meet all demands made upon it up to the moment the bank suspends payment. This he may do under ordinary circumstances. . . . But can he stand behind the counter, and, while he is dealing out to importunate creditors their legal demands with one hand, with the other place the assets of the bank in his pocket for absent friends and favorites?" Of course, the picture here drawn is not an exact representation of the situation now before us, but it clearly shows what may result if we sustain the positions which have been so ably supported by counsel for the appellants. Instead of equality among the creditors of a hopelessly insolvent corporation, we should have the most glaring inequality; and not only the main object and purpose of our insolvent laws would be defeated, but, as we think, every rule of fair dealing would be violated. It was said in Fitzgerald & M. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 137 U. S. 110, 34 L. ed. 608, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, [Richardson v. Green, 133 U. S. 43, 33 L. ed. 521, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280], speaking of loans made by an officer and stockholder to a corporation, that, "undoubtedly his relation as a director and officer or as a stockholder of the company does not preclude him from entering into contracts with it, making loans to it, and taking its bonds as collateral security; but courts of equity regard such personal transactions of a party in either of these positions, not perhaps with distrust, but with a large measure of watchful care; and unless satisfied by the proof that the transaction was entered into in good faith, with a view to the benefit of the company, as well as of its creditors, and not solely with a view to his own benefit, they refuse to lend their aid to its enforcement." In § 661 of 2 Cook, Stock. Stockholders & Corp. Law (page 938), the author, after quoting the foregoing sentence, says: "But, where the corporation is insolvent, an entirely different question arises. There has been a difference of opinion in the courts, but the weight of authority clearly and wisely holds that an insolvent corporation cannot pay a debt due to a director in preference to debts due others, either by turning over property or cash to him, or by giving him a mortgage on corporate assets." The contract doctrine, we know, has been held by a number of tribunals for which we have the highest respect, but we do not feel justified in extending this opinion to the length which would be required to cite and comment upon that line of cases. They will be found collected in the recent case of Corey v. Wadsworth, 118 Ala. 488, 44 L. R. A. 766, 25 So. 503. See also Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co. v. Perry Stove Mfg. Co. (Tex.) 22 L. R. A. 802, where the conflicting decisions are reviewed in a note to that case. In many of the cases which hold that an insolvent corporation may legally and fairly pay its officers as preferred creditors the well-known rule applicable to natural persons is adopted, —that is to say, unless there is some statutory prohibition, a corporation has the same right to prefer its friends and officers that an individual has to prefer his friends and relatives,—and that preference as applied to corporations as well as individuals is altogether a matter of favor, and is not based on any equitable principle whatever. We cannot assent to a doctrine fraught with such dangerous consequences. In our opinion, a much wiser and safer rule is that announced by the court in the case of Sutton Mfg. Co. v. Hutchinson, 24 U. S. App. 146, 63 Fed. Rep. 501, 11 C. C. A. 320 (Justice Harlan), that no preference will be allowed unless authorized by statute, or legally given by the corporation. As has been frequently said, a very large proportion of all the business of every kind in this country is done by corporations, and their creditors are, like themselves, found everywhere. It requires but little foresight, however, to predict that, if it be announced by courts of equity that corporations insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, or in failing circumstances, may pay the debts of their officers as preferred creditors, neither general creditors nor stockholders will have any redress. With such protection as this view will afford the president, directors, and other officers, and stockholders who are creditors, secured as they will be by all the assets of the corporation, they may and will enter into fields of the wildest speculation without the fear of loss to themselves. They may loan, and have a right to loan, their money to the corporation, and in violation of their duty they may speculate with it in the corporate name. If losses result, the stockholders and creditors must bear them, for the president and directors either take the money of the corporation to make themselves whole, or secure themselves by transfers and assignments of corporate property. Such payments or transfers, unless void for some other reason, must, according to the contention of the defendants, be held good whether the corporation be solvent or insolvent. In our opinion, fairness and justice require that the officers should be placed on an equality, and no more than an equality, with the other creditors of the corporation. And so, in the case of Sutton Mfg. Co. v. Hutchinson, 24 U. S. App. 145, 63 Fed. Rep. 501, 11 C. C. A. 320, Harlan, J., says: "It is, we think, the result of the cases that, when a private corporation is dissolved, or becomes insolvent, and determines to discontinue the prosecution of business, its property is thereafter affected by an equitable lien or trust for the benefit of creditors. The duty in such cases of preserving it for creditors rests upon the directors or officers to whom has been committed the authority to control and manage its affairs. Although such directors and officers are not technical trustees, they hold, in respect to the property under their control, a fiduciary relation to creditors; and, necessarily, in the disposition of the property of an insolvent corporation, all creditors are equal in right, unless preference or priority has been legally given by statute or by the act of the corporation to particular creditors." We refer also to Rouse v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 493, 5 L. R. A. 378, 22 N. E. 293; Richards v. New Hampshire Ins. Co. 43 N. H. 263; Drury v. Cross, 7 Wall. 302, sub nom. Drury v. Milwaukee & S. R. Co. 19 L. ed. 40; Bradley v. Farwell, Holmes, 433, Fed. Cas. No. 1,779; Montgomery v. Phillips, 53 N. J. Eq. 203, 31 Atl. 622; Corbett v. Woodward, 5 Sawy. 417, Fed. Cas. No. 3,223; Sicardi v. Keystone Oil Co. 149 Pa. 148, 24 Atl. 164. See also 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 787, and notes for collection of authorities; 2 Cook, Stock, Stockholders, & Corp. Law, § 661, and notes.

In concluding what we have to say upon this question we will refer briefly to several of our own decisions which we think are based upon the same salutary doctrine we adopt in this case. In the case of Hoffman Steam Coal Co. v. Cumberland Coal & I. Co. 16 Md. 456, 77 Am. Dec. 311, the then court (Le Grand, Ch. J.) rigorously applied to the officers of a corporation dealing with it the same rules that a court of equity will apply to the dealings between a trustee and his cestui que trust. Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 266, 89 Am. Dec. 779. And in Cumberland Coal & I. Co. v. Parish, 42 Md. 598, the strict rule is again applied to the officers of a corporation. "The affairs of corporations are generally intrusted to the exclusive management and control of the board of directors; and there is an inherent obligation, implied in the acceptance of such a trust, not only that they will use their best efforts to promote the interests of the shareholders, but that they will in no manner use their positions to advance their own individual interest as distinguished from that of the corporation, or acquire interests that may conflict with the fair and proper discharge of their duty." Certainly one of the interests of every corporation is that, while solvent, all its creditors should be fully paid, and, when insolvent, that all its assets should be equally divided, and not awarded by the president and directors or other officers to themselves and their friends. While the exercise of this right of preference by insolvent corporations has been justified by the fact that courts generally concede it to natural persons when not prohibited, yet there is no real analogy between the two cases. In the latter the individual freely and voluntarily confers the favor upon another, while in the former the persons by whom the corporation can alone act confer the favor upon themselves. There is nothing equitable in such preferences, whether exercised by an individual or by a corporation, and so long as it is not expressly conferred upon corporations, and is neither incident to nor necessary to the accomplishment of any of their ends, and is so productive of unfairness and fraud, it should not, in our opinion, be given to them by implication. But, again, is it not settled that so soon as the corporation becomes insolvent, and when it is contemplating insolvency, its directors become trustees for all the creditors? If this be so, how can these very officers forget their duties as trustees, and appropriate to their own use the fund which the law has wisely dedicated to the equal payment of the creditors? It would be folly to hold that the trust-fund doctrine has no application except where an act of insolvency has been committed and the powers of the insolvent court have been actually invoked. It seems clear to us that, if this doctrine is to have any efficacy, it must be held to apply to a case like this, where, as we have seen, the payments were made when the corporation was actually insolvent, and under circumstances which convince us that the directors knew or were bound to know the bank was hopelessly insolvent, and would, as it did, the very next business day after the payments were made, close its doors, and deny admittance to its depositors who wished to withdraw their deposits.

The payment of the $5,000 demand note of the South Baltimore Bank held by the Citizens' National Bank, and indorsed by Cahill, Denny, and Storey, it seems to us, was as much a breach of trust and violation of duty, so far as the indorsers are concerned, as was the payment of the $10,000 note directly to Cahill. They were all directors, and if (as it was) their bank was then insolvent they held its assets as a trust fund to be fairly and equally distributed among all the creditors, and it was a clear breach of trust to pay this note in full, and thus relieve themselves from the obligation they had assumed. If the directors, the bank being insolvent and about to close its doors, had met, and passed a resolution to pay this note in order to relieve the indorsers from loss, can there be any doubt that such payment would be held a preference, as to them? As was said in Mayer's Case, 90 Md. 711, 45 Atl. 874, the receivers may sue for and recover assets, and may maintain suits to set aside preferences, even when the corporation could not do so, which have been disposed of contrary to law. We see no good reason, therefore, why they may not also sue the indorsers on a claim from which they have been illegally and fraudulently released. Under § 269, art. 23, apart from § 264a, they are vested with all the estate and assets belonging to the bank, and are declared to be trustees of the creditors and stockholders, with all the powers necessary to wind up the affairs of the corporation. In the case of Willison v. First Nat. Bank, 80 Md. 198, 30 Atl. 749, it was held that the payment of certain notes by the insolvent to relieve the indorser from his liability on them was an illegal preference as to him, and the insolvent trustee was allowed to recover from the indorser the amount of the notes so paid. It was contended that not only this note, but also the check for $10,000 of the Clark Company, was paid in the ordinary course of business; but in the face of the facts which we think are established by the testimony this view cannot prevail. The check was paid by Cahill, as we have seen, to himself, when he was bound to know the bank was insolvent; and the demand note was paid without the asking, therefore without demand, and voluntarily, and before it was due. 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 625; Willison v. First Nat. Bank, 80 Md. 198, 30 Atl. 749. So far from this being a payment in the ordinary course of business, a payment forced from a debtor by an unfortunate creditor, it was a voluntary preference in favor of Cahill and the other indorsers. Van Wagenen v. Pater-son Sav. Bank, 10 N. J. Eq. 16.

It is unnecessary further to consider the question how far a court of equity, under its general jurisdiction, apart from § 264a, has power to appoint receivers to take possession of the assets, and wind up insolvent corporations. In State v. Northern C. R. Co. 18 Md. 193, it is said it is not against public policy to appoint receivers for property of corporations when, through fraud or other cause, the property would otherwise be in imminent danger of loss to those interested. This same doctrine has been frequently announced by this court. Thus, in the recent case of Davis v. United States Electric Power & Light Co. 77 Md. 41, 25 Atl. 982, where insolvency was not alleged, it was held that, if the directors were pursuing a fraudulent policy, which would ruin the company, receivers would be appointed. But this question is not important, for, however defective the averments of the bill in the original case may be, as was said in Hayes v. Brotsman, 46 Md. 519, the decree in the case under which these receivers are acting, being a decree "of a court of competent jurisdiction to pass it, carried with it the presumption of regularity. It was not necessary, as contended by the appellee, that the appellant should have gone further, and offered proof that the circuit court had acquired jurisdiction to pass the order by proper averments in the bill." If, therefore, that decree be binding, the assets of this insolvent corporation will be distributed according to "the principles of equity," whether under the insolvent law, as provided by § 11, art. 47, or under the rules regulating a court of equity; in either case the rule of distribution being the same.

Schmucker, J., concurring:

I concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court in this case because, in my judgment, the payment by the South Baltimore Bank of the $10,000 to the James Clark Company, and that of the note for $5,000, on which certain of its directors were sureties, were made at a time and under circumstances when its directors must, in equity, be treated as having become trustees for its creditors; and, as the payments were made to or for the benefit of certain of the directors, they constitute such preferences as should not be upheld. The cases which have discussed the trust-fund doctrine as applied to corporate assets have been so fully cited in the opinion of the majority of the court and the dissenting opinion of the learned Chief Justice that it would serve no good purpose to cite them again in this one. Many of these cases, in defining the doctrine, use broad language, and deny the right of directors of a corporation to take advantage of their position at any time to obtain preferences for themselves, or for their unsecured debts. Other cases define it more strictly, and say that only where a corporation has been lawfully dissolved, or has become insolvent, does its property become a trust fund in the hands of its directors for the payment of its debts; and that, so long as it is a going concern, having possession and management of its property, its transactions made bona fide in the ordinary course of its business will be upheld, whether they be made with its own directors or with strangers. The decided majority of the cases, when closely examined, will be found to sus-tain the proposition that so long as the affairs of a corporation, even if its assets do not equal its liabilities, are in such condition that its creditors may fairly and reasonably expect it to continue its business, and become extricated from its difficulties, they may lawfully continue its current transactions, and pay its debts to themselves or to others as they fall due. But so soon as it becomes apparent that the corporation cannot longer safely conduct its business, the directors become trustees of its assets for all of the creditors, in so far, at least, that they cannot prefer themselves in their distribution. It would be both irrational and dishonest to say that the directors, after it has become plainly apparent that the corporation must stop, may keep it going for a few days longer, until they can procure its debts to themselves to be paid, and then defend their action upon the pretense that the corporation was a going concern at the time when the payments were made.

The main purpose of the present opinion is to state somewhat more fully than is done in the majority opinion the facts which seem to me to call for the application of the trust-fund doctrine to the assets of the South Baltimore Bank at the time when the controverted payments were made. The record plainly shows that the bank was then, and for several years prior thereto had been, actually insolvent. It also shows that the fact of this actual insolvency, if not apparent upon the face of the bank's books, was so easily ascertainable by a slight examination into its affairs, that the directors may fairly be held chargeable with knowledge of it, and its probable consequences. Monthly statements of the assets and liabilities of the bank were currently made, and several of the statements showing its condition at and about the time of the payments in question appear in the record. These statements are identical in their important items, and all of them show that the bank's capital of $28,500 was impaired to the extent of more than one half. They further show that more than the entire remaining capital, amounting to $12,053.91, was locked up in real estate, that a still larger sum was in mortgages, and that $4,115.30 was represented by unsatisfied judgments. In fact, the only way the monthly statements were made to balance was by placing among the liabilities the capital stock at but $12,053.61, instead of $28,500, which was the true amount of stock then outstanding. A slight inquiry into the nature and value of the assets appearing upon these statements would have disclosed the utter insolvency of the bank. The real estate, which appeared thereon at $13,213.54, was of little value, and brought but $3,725 when sold. The mortgages, valued in the statement at $14,654, yielded less than half that amount; and one of the judgments was against an insolvent. The record shows affirmatively that on the day after the two payments in question were made some, at least, of the directors were aware of the low value of these assets. Now, with the bank and its accounts in this condition, Simon P. Schott, who was the cashier of the American National Bank, and an experienced bank officer, on February 19, 1898, met Cahill, the president of the South Baltimore Bank, at its office, by appointment, for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of that institution, in order to determine whether he would be justified in asking some of his friends to furnish it additional capital. At this interview Schott was furnished by the officials of the bank with statements of its condition, including one or more of the monthly statements already described in this opinion. About two hours was spent in this interview, as Schott says, "talking about the statement," which was at that time criticised by him. He called Cahill's attention to the erroneous character of the entry debiting the capital stock at but $12,053.61, when there was $28,500 of it outstanding, for which the bank had received par value in money, and warned him that the entry would not be passed by a bank examiner if the state should adopt a plan then under consideration of requiring a periodical examination of state banks. On the following Wednesday, February 23, in the afternoon, Cahill and others of the directors of the South Baltimore Bank called upon Schott, at his request, at his office, having with them a statement of the condition of the bank. Schott says that his purpose in requesting Cahill to bring the other directors with him was to verify the statement of the bank's condition as to the worth of the assets. He further says: "When we came together, I asked about the various securities, or, rather, the various sums of money appearing as assets in the form of real estate and judgments, and the answers received satisfied me conclusively that the bank was in a hopelessly insolvent condition, and so stated to the gentlemen present." Schott then expressed the opinion to the directors that they would be both morally and criminally liable if they continued the bank's business knowing that it was insolvent. The directors had another conference that evening, and as a result thereof they applied to the circuit court the next morning for the appointment of a receiver and a liquidation of the bank's affairs. As Sunday and Tuesday, the 22d of February, were holidays, there were but two business days between the meeting of Schott with Cahill on Saturday and his meeting with the directors on Wednesday afternoon. During those two business days the debt of $10,000 to the James Clark Company, of which Cahill was substantially the sole owner, was paid, as was also the call loan of $5,000, for which he and others of the directors were sureties. It is unnecessary to repeat in detail the steps by which these payments were accomplished. It is sufficient to say that they manifest an intelligent purpose, and show an active participation on the part of Cahill. Cahill, in the meantime, on either Monday or Tuesday had gone to the office of counsel, and given directions for the preparation of a general assignment by the bank for the benefit of its creditors. As over against the very pregnant circumstances which have just been narrated it must be said that Cahill and several of his codirectors testify that they were ignorant of the bank's insolvency until informed of it by Schott on the afternoon of the 23d of February, and Schott says that he did not express any opinion to the directors as to the solvency of the bank until that afternoon. Cahill further says that he was influenced to give directions to counsel for the preparation of the proposed general assignment from the bank, not by its insolvent condition, but because he feared that the state was about to pass a law requiring banks to submit to examinations, and maintain a reserve; neither of which things his bank could do. The fact that Cahill, only two or three months before the bank's stoppage, bought its stock at $20 per share, the par value being $25 per share, and the further fact that he and the other directors were willing to indorse its $5,000 note, indicate that prior to February 19, 1898, they did not properly appreciate the real condition of the bank. In view, however, of the purpose of the interview between Schott and Cahill at the bank on February 19, the time which it consumed, and the subject-matter of discussion during that time, and the alacrity with which the directors thereafter took steps to procure the payment of the debts due to them, or for which they were liable, I am unable to give my assent to the proposition that those payments were made bona fide in the ordinary course of business, or that they are in equity entitled to be protected. They seem rather to have been made after the attention of the directors, or some of them, had been called to the true condition of the bank, and in contemplation and upon the threshold of a stoppage of business and commercial insolvency. What we have said does not conflict with the rulings of this court in the cases of Brant v. Ehlen, 59 Md. 24, 25, and Fear v. Bartlett, 81 Md. 443, 33 L. R. A. 721, 32 Atl. 322. In those cases the question of the fiduciary relation of the directors of a corporation to its creditors, or of their right, if they also happen to be creditors, to prefer themselves, or to secure an advantage at the expense of the other creditors, was not before the court for consideration. In the cases of Hoffman Steam Coal Co. v. Cumberland Coal & I. Co. 16 Md. 456, 77 Am. Dec. 311, and Cumberland Coal & I. Co. v. Parish, 42 Md. 605, although the fiduciary character of the relation of the directors of a corporation to its stockholders was the subject directly under consideration, what was there said by the court as to the design of the rule then announced being to secure a faithful discharge of their duties by the directors, and at the same time to close the door, as far as possible, against all temptations to do wrong on their part, might with propriety be applied to the situation of the directors of the South Baltimore Bank in relation to its creditors at the time the payments in question were made.

McSherry, Ch. J., dissenting:

verted, they are free from difficulty; but there is a wide difference between the contending parties as to what are the legal principles which grow out of those facts, and which ought to govern the ultimate decision of this litigation. A brief outline of the circumstances disclosed by the record will present with sufficient clearness the pivotal points of the controversy. The South Baltimore Bank was incorporated by the general assembly of Maryland in 1868. On the 24th of February, 1898, a bill in equity was filed against it in circuit court No. 2 of Baltimore by certain creditors, and on the same day a receiver was appointed to take possession of its property and assets. In the bill of complaint it was alleged that the bank was insolvent, and this allegation was admitted by the bank in its answer. Later on, allusion will be made to this admission. The bill did not pray for a dissolution of the corporation; but on June 1st of the same year a decree was signed declaring the bank to be insolvent, and adjudging that the corporation be dissolved. The proceedings of February 24 were inaugurated at the instance of the board of directors of the bank, and this action of the board was taken late on the evening of February 23. The cause which induced the proceeding is of vital importance in this discussion, and fortunately it is devoid of doubt or dispute. The president of the bank, Mr. Cahill, who had been holding that position for about eleven months, was much interested in the success of the institution. He was anxious to expand and enlarge it, believing that it was in a sound and solvent condition. So fully was he impressed with this belief that he invited Mr. Schott, the cashier of the American National Bank, to whom he had been recently introduced, to join with him in an effort to increase the capital of the South Baltimore Bank. Mr. Schott, feeling an interest in Mr. Cahill's earnestness, promised to look into the condition of the bank with a view of assisting in an extension of its business. Neither Cahill nor any of the directors had at that time the slightest idea that the bank was not absolutely solvent. Mr. Schott, pursuant to his promise, called at the bank on February 19, and made a cursory examination of its statements, and, observing some entries which he did not think were in proper form, suggested that, if the bill was adopted which was said to be then pending before the legislature, providing for the appointment of a state bank examiner, and subjecting state banks to the same regulations and restrictions which, under the Revised Statutes of the United States, are applicable to national banks, the examiner would probably find fault with those entries. On the afternoon of February 23, about 5 o'clock, Mr. Schott, after discovering what Cahill and the other directors did not know,—that some of the securities carried by the bank among its assets were valueless, or nearly so,—informed Mr. Cahill that "the bank was in a hopelessly insolvent condition and said to him "that if he continued doing business after learning that his institution was insolvent . . . he not only made himself morally but criminally liable." Thereupon Cahill sent notice to the directors to convene that evening at the Carrollton Hotel. When they assembled he disclosed to them the results of Schott's investigations, and Schott, being present, confirmed Cahill's statement; and the following morning, as a result of this meeting, and pursuant to the action there had, the bill for the appointment of a receiver was filed. Mr. Schott was appointed at once, and later on Mr. Colton was named a coreceiver. There is no pretense that either Cahill or any other director or officer of the bank had the slightest suspicion that the bank was insolvent until Schott informed them that it was, and so informed them after the close of business on the evening of February 23d. Proceedings of some sort, but not proceedings founded on an allegation of insolvency, or even involving the question of insolvency in any form, were undoubtedly contemplated by Mr. Cahill before the meeting of February 23. Possibly on Monday, the 21st, but at all events on Tuesday, the 22d, Mr. Cahill consulted Mr. Hazell, an attorney at law, with reference to a proceeding to wind up the bank if such a step should be deemed necessary by the directors in consequence of the supposed pending legislation at Annapolis. But there can be no doubt in the world that this contemplated action had relation to and was prompted solely by a consideration wholly different from a suspected insolvency. Mr. Cahill had been led to believe that a state law was pretty certain to be passed by the general assembly, under which the bank would be required to retain as a reserve fund 25 per cent of its deposits, and would be prohibited from lending to any one person more than 10 per cent of its capital; and he was convinced by the statements of Mr. Schott that, if the bank could not or would not comply with these provisions, its doors would be closed as soon as the law should be passed. Mr. Cahill seems to have been satisfied that it would be impossible for the bank, with its limited capital of $28,500, and its comparatively small commercial deposits of about $70,000 and its saving deposits of but a slightly larger amount, to continue business if this proposed law went into effect. This was explained to Mr. Hazell by Cahill, and Cahill further stated to Mr. Hazell that there would be a meeting of the directors to consider the consequences of this proposed legislation, and that he (Cahill) wanted to have such papers prepared as might be necessary in the event of the directors "deciding to do anything." But there was not the suggestion or a suspicion at that time of the bank being insolvent, or unable to pay its creditors in full; nor was a receivership mentioned. The whole conference with Mr. Hazell, and the papers which he was to prepare, had relation exclusively to the bank legislation which Schott had informed Cahill was then pending in the general assembly. The James Clark Company is a corporation of which Mr. Cahill is the president and treasurer, 49 L. R. A.

besides being the owner of all the capital stock with the exception of four shares. This company, through Cahill, had repeatedly lent to the South Baltimore Bank, without interest, considerable sums of money to meet the needs of the bank's customers. These loans are spoken of in the record as special deposits, and were purely for the accommodation of the bank. They differed from an ordinary deposit in this: that an ordinary deposit is made primarily for the convenience of the depositor, but these were taken from the James Clark Company's regular bank account with the Citizens' National Bank, and placed with the South Baltimore Bank, exclusively for the latter's benefit. On the 21st of February, 1898, the amount due by the bank to the James Clark Company on this loan or special deposit was $10,545.77. It was subject to check whenever the James Clark Company needed the money. On the day just named the Clark Company, by Cahill, as treasurer, drew its check on the South Baltimore Bank for this sum, and deposited the check in the Citizens' National Bank, where, as stated a while ago, the Clark Company kept its regular bank account. This was done before Mr. Hazell had been conferred with, and before there was any thought of closing the bank; and it was done because Mr. Cahill needed the money to pay the bills of the Clark Company. The South Baltimore Bank was not a member of the Baltimore clearing house. It cleared through the Citizens' National Bank. To enable it to do this, it kept a deposit with the Citizens' National Bank, and against that deposit the checks cleared for it by the Citizens' Bank were charged each day. February 22 being a legal holiday, the banks were not opened; and so this particular check for $10,545.77 appears in the transactions of February 23, upon which day it was charged against the account of the South Baltimore Bank. On February 21 the South Baltimore Bank paid the Citizens' National Bank a call-loan note of $5,000. The money had been borrowed five days previously, as the amount of interest paid shows. This loan was evidenced by a note which Cahill, Storey, and Denny, directors, indorsed. They indorsed it, not because an indorsement was required, but because by furnishing security the South Baltimore Bank procured the loan at one half of 1 per cent less interest. On the same day,—February 21,—Cahill borrowed from the Citizens' National Bank for the South Baltimore Bank the sum of $15,000, and pledged as collateral $18,000 of the latter's commercial paper. This is not an unusual occurrence in the banking business. On the 4th of June, 1898, two bills in equity were filed by the receivers,—one against the James Clark Company and Cahill; the other against Cahill, Storey and Denny. Under the first the payment of the $10,545.77 made by the South Baltimore Bank to the James Clark Company on the check drawn February 21 is assailed; and under the second the payment of the $5,000 call-loan note on the same day is attacked.

Under the first the receivers seek to recover back from the Clark Company and from Cahill the money paid by the South Baltimore Bank on the check. Under the second they seek to recover from the indorsers of the call-loan note, but not from the Citizens' National Bank, the payee, the money paid by the South Baltimore Bank to the Citizens' National Bank. The two cases have been consolidated. The ground upon which recovery is sought in each case is the same, and that ground is that the payment of the check and of the note was a preference given to two creditors of the insolvent bank to the prejudice of all its other creditors, for whom and for whose benefit Cahill and the other directors were, in virtue of their office as directors, trustees; and as trustees they were prohibited from preferring themselves at the expense of their cestuis que trust. Did these transactions, under the conditions and circumstances stated, constitute prohibited preferences? A preference is an advantage, and to be a prohibited preference it must either be one which contravenes some equitable principle, or violates some positive statutory provision. In neither instance can it exist if there is no insolvency, because if there is no insolvency, there can be no inequality in the payment of creditors, and without inequality there is no advantage. At the foundation of the investigation, therefore, lies the inquiry whether, on February 21, when these payments were made, the South Baltimore Bank was insolvent. But before this inquiry can be answered accurately or intelligently, it is necessary that there should be a clear understanding of what is meant by the term "insolvency." If insolvency means a condition where liabilities are greater than the value of assets, then the bank was, as subsequent events showed, not only insolvent on February 21, 1898, but it had been equally and continuously so for four years antecedently thereto. Such a test of insolvency, however, would wreck a large proportion of flourishing enterprises. What railroad or city passenger railroad company, for instance, could possibly exhibit available assets equal in actual cash value to its bonded and other indebtedness? But, if insolvency means merely an inability to pay debts when and as they mature in the ordinary course of business, then the bank was not insolvent, and its doors should not have been closed. There is a difference between a bank which has something less of assets than of liabilities and a bank which has assets equivalent to or greater than its liabilities, if those assets are unavailable, or cannot be converted into money. But the advantage is on the side of the former. The one, having less assets than liabilities, may be able to continue its business, while the other, having more assets than liabilities, might be forced to suspend because of its inability to meet the demands made on it in the usual and ordinary course. The first, though having a deficiency of assets, would be commercially solvent; the second, though having an excess of assets, would be commercially insolvent. The relation of the assets to the liabilities cannot, therefore, be the ultimate test of solvency.

The meaning of insolvency in its legal sense is not now open to debate in Maryland. Following the definition laid down by the Supreme Court in Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. 40, 20 L. ed. 481, this court distinctly and categorically adjudged that insolvency must be taken to mean "an inability of the debtor to pay his debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business." Castleberg v. Wheeler, 68 Md. 277, 12 Atl. 3. Now, it is clear from the evidence that the bank was in better condition when it suspended business than it had been in for four years previously. There is nothing in the record to show that it was unable to pay its debts as they became due in the ordinary course of business. On the contrary, it had paid them as they matured in the past. It was not without ample funds, and it had facilities for procuring ready money if emergencies required that it should have more than its vaults contained. No bank that is not utterly stagnant and lifeless ever carries as much cash as it owes its depositors. Its ability to meet the demands made upon it as they mature in the due and ordinary course of business, and not the amount of cash on hand, or the isolated fact that its assets are equal to its liabilities, is the test of its solvency and the measure of its duty to its creditors. The South Baltimore Bank had the confidence of the people of South Baltimore; and Mr. O'Connell, cashier of the Citizens' National Bank, and a totally disinterested witness, testified: "I believed it to be solvent then, and do yet, and I think it was in a great deal better financial condition than thousands of people who make fortunes and die rich. They had credit, character, standing, confidence, and some money." "They never ought to have made an assignment." At the close of business on February 21, after the payment of the $5,000 call-loan note, and after crediting the $15,000 borrowed on collateral, the bank had in its vaults and on deposit with the Citizens' National Bank, a balance of $31,409.50; and on the 23d, at the close of business, after paying the $10,545.77 check, it had a balance of $23,295.13, while its liabilities to depositors aggregated about $140,000. It thus had quite as large a reserve as is required to be held by national banks outside of New York, Baltimore, and a few other cities. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5191. Even if the $15,000 had not been borrowed, both the note and the check could have been paid, and there would have been a balance of $8,295.13 still left in cash. But the $15,000 was procured, so Cahill says, to have a fund for customers who might wish to borrow; and this is not disputed or denied. During these same two days the deposits received—both commercial and savings—aggregated $24,608.50. If we turn to the statements, and compare that of January 30, 1897, with that of January 31, 1898, it will be found that the commercial deposits rose from $45,380.39 to $71,610.91, and the savings deposits rose from $65,152.02 to $72.-

671.51. The loans and discounts swelled from $71,924.74 to $94,865.75. These figures indicate a growth, a development, and an activity, rather than degeneracy or decline; and, as there is nothing in the record to show that the bank could not have continued in the usual, ordinary course other than the single fact that it did not continue because of being misled, there is no evidence of an insolvency in the legal sense of the term. Now, if there is any credence to be placed in human testimony, not an officer or a director of the bank had any knowledge that the bank was insolvent in either sense of the term. Their acts are more emphatic and more significant than their words. Though the capital stock was carried on the statements at less than 50 per cent of its par value of $25 per share, both Cahill and Storey bought shares at $20, or 80 per cent of par, shortly before the collapse, and that, too, though the stock thus bought, as well as that which they previously held, was subject to the double-liability clause prescribed by § 39, art. 3, of the state Constitution and by § 18 of the bank's charter. On February 17, Cahill, Storey, and Denny indorsed the call-loan note for $5,000, and Storey made deposits as late as February 23. It is simply incredible that these men would have purchased stock at nearly twice the value estimated in the statements, would have exposed themselves to this double-liability burden, would have assumed responsibility as indorsers, and deliberately deposited their money up to the last moment the bank's doors were open, if they had not honestly believed the bank to be solvent. If they are to be charged with knowing what they ought to have known, but did not know, then they could be charged with knowledge that the assets were less than the liabilities; but that would not be knowledge that the bank was insolvent.

While there can be no prohibited preference where there is no insolvency, there may be insolvency, in the popular sense, and still be no preference which contravenes any equitable principle, though a payment has been made to one creditor, who is also a director, to the exclusion of other creditors. The trust-fund doctrine, which is the equitable principle relied on to invalidate these payments, is said to have had its origin in Wood's Case, 3 Mason, 308, Fed. Cas. No. 17,944. But that was a contest between stockholders and creditors of a bank, where the stockholders appropriated the assets to the exclusion of the creditors. "But, whatever may have been the origin of the doctrine," said this court in Fear v. Bartlett, 81 Md. 443, 33 L. R. A. 721, 32 Atl. 323, "it means, and can only mean, that when a corporation has been lawfully dissolved, or has become insolvent, its entire property, including unpaid subscriptions to its capital stock, becomes a trust fund for the payment of its debts, and that creditors are entitled in equity to have their debts paid out of the assets of the company before there can be any distribution among the stockholders. . . . But it is only when the company has been dissolved or has become insolvent that this 49 L. R. A.

equitable doctrine arises. So long as the company is a going concern, having the possession and management of its property, contracts made by and with the company are governed by the same principles of law as contracts between individuals." Other cases might be cited to the same effect, but they would make the principle no more apparent, though I may refer to Comfort v. McTeer, 7 Lea, 652. This trust-fund doctrine has never been pushed as far in this state, as it is now attempted to carry it. When a corporation has ceased to be a going concern, when it has been dissolved, when it has no longer the possession and management of its property, or when it has become insolvent in the sense that it is unable to pay its debts as they mature in the usual and ordinary course of business, it may well be that all its assets and property become a trust fund, and that its officers and directors become trustees for the benefit of its creditors. But this doctrine has no existence during the time the corporation is a going concern, or while it has not been dissolved, or when it is not insolvent in the legal sense. Notwithstanding this, the specific contention with respect to the check is that, if the depositor in a bank draws his check upon that bank, and the check is paid in the usual and ordinary course while the bank is a going concern, the payment of that check is a prohibited preference if two days afterwards the bank closes its doors, and goes into liquidation, and if the drawer of the check was a director or an officer of the bank. And the specific contention with respect to the call-loan note is that if such a note is paid in the usual course of business, and the debtor bank suspends operations a few days afterwards, the indorsers of that note, if they happen to be directors, must pay to the receivers of the debtor bank the money paid out of the funds of the debtor to the creditor bank in settlement of the call-loan note. These contentions, if sustained, make the directors trustees for the creditors while the bank is a going concern, and while it is still solvent; and, besides that, they stand directly in antagonism to the principle which the Supreme Court applied in McDonald v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 174 U. S. 610, 43 L. ed. 1106, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 787. The Capital National Bank of Nebraska for some years carried on a large business intercourse with the Chemical National Bank of New York. The Capital Bank transacted the usual and ordinary business of a national bank up to the close of banking hours on January 21, 1893. On the next day a bank examiner took possession of it, and on February 6 a receiver was appointed. It appeared in evidence that on January 18, 1893, the account of the Capital Bank with the Chemical Bank was overdrawn to the amount of $84,486.19, and that by sundry remittances made the overdraft was cut down to $25,515.32 on January 21. It also appeared that on January 18 the Schuster-Hax National Bank of St. Joseph, Missouri, remitted by mail $2,000 to the Chemical Bank for the credit of the Capital Bank; that on January 19 the Packers' National Bank of South Omaha remitted to the Chemical Bank $5,000 for the credit and advice of the Capital Bank; that on January 20, two days before it was closed, the Capital Bank remitted by mail to the Chemical Bank $735, in small items, and a package amounting to $2,935.60, and on the 21st (the last day the bank was open) another package, amounting to $833.64. On January 23—after the Capital Bank's doors had been closed by the examiner—the Chemical Bank received the remittance of $2,000 of the 18th, and those of $5,000 of the 19th, and of $2,935.60 and of $735 of the 20th; and on the 24th it received the remittance of $833.64 of the 21st. The receiver of the Capital Bank filed a bill against the Chemical Bank to recover from it the moneys received by it after the suspension of the Capital Bank. The relief sought was denied. In the course of its judgment the Supreme Court said: "Nor can a finding that the payments and remittances made to the Chemical National Bank on the dates above mentioned were made in contemplation of insolvency, and with an intent to prefer that bank, be based on the mere allegation that the Capital National Bank was actually insolvent, and that its insolvency must have been known to its officers. It is matter of common knowledge that banks and other corporations continue, in many instances, to do their regular and ordinary business for long periods, though in a condition of actual insolvency, as disclosed by subsequent events. It cannot surely be said that all payments made in the due course of business in such cases are to be deemed to be made in contemplation of insolvency, or with a view to prefer one creditor to another. There is often the hope that, if only the credit of the bank can be kept up by continuing its ordinary business, and by avoiding any act of insolvency, affairs may take a favorable turn, and thus suspension of payments and of business be avoided. In the present instance there was not only no allegation of payments made in contemplation of insolvency, or with a view to prefer the Chemical National Bank, but there was no evidence that, up to the closing hours of January 21, 1893, the Capital National Bank had failed to pay any depositor on demand, or had not met at maturity all its obligations. And the evidence fails to disclose any intention or expectation on the part of its officers to presently suspend business. It rather shows that up to the last the operations of the bank and its transactions with the Chemical National Bank were conducted in the usual manner. It may be that those of its officers who knew its real condition must have dreaded an ultimate catastrophe, but there is nothing to justify the inference that the particular payments in question were made in contemplation of insolvency, or with a view to prefer the defendant bank. The Chemical National Bank was no more preferred by these remittances several days before suspension than were the depositors whose checks were paid an hour before the doors were closed." The trust-fund doctrine does not apply because the point of time at which, as respects creditors, it arises, if it arises at all, had not come to pass when the payments were made. There was no legal insolvency and the bank was a going concern, and had not suspended when the check was drawn and paid, and when the call-loan note was settled. Both were paid in the usual and ordinary and accustomed course of business, and at a time when there was no doubt in the minds of the directors and officers that the bank was solvent, and when there was no thought of discontinuing its business. Under the most rigid and extreme application of the trust-fund doctrine the directors do not become trustees for the creditors, however they may stand towards the stockholders, until the corporation ceases to be a going concern, or is insolvent in the sense of being unable to meet its obligations as they mature in the ordinary course of business. If this were otherwise, then no one could venture to be a depositor in a bank of which he was a director; and then, too, the very depositors for whose benefit the receivers are prosecuting these suits would be bound to pay back some $96,000 of funds drawn out by them within the four months prior to the suspension of the bank, if they happened to be directors or officers of the bank. For if it be a preference to pay two days before suspension, it is equally a preference to pay four months anterior thereto. The mere proximity of the time of payment to the actual suspension can make no difference in the legal principle, if it be a legal principle, that such payments as these are preferences. The trust-fund doctrine, as heretofore applied in Maryland, has never been stretched to the length of declaring that the payment by a bank of the check of a depositor drawn by him in good faith, and in the usual course, was a preference if the depositor happened to be a director and the bank was a going concern and was believed to be perfectly solvent, though it closed its doors a few days afterwards, not because it was unable to continue business, but because its officers were misled in supposing that it was insolvent when in fact it was commercially solvent. Nor has it ever yet been held in this state that the payment by a going bank of a call-loan note to another bank in the usual and ordinary course of business was such a preference as would hold the indorsers of that note liable to the receivers of the bank which made the note, merely because, after the payment of the note, the debtor bank closed its doors, and turned out to be insolvent in the sense that the actual, but not the nominal, value of its assets was less than the aggregate of its liabilities.

But there is another view of this question, which ought not to be overlooked. In the discussion thus far the situation has been treated from the standpoint that the check for $10,545.77 was drawn by a depositor who was also a director, but the fact is that the depositor and the director were not one and the same. The depositor was a corporation, and the person who was the president of that corporation was the director. It was the check of the corporation which was drawn and paid, and the precise question is this: Does the circumstance that the president of the depositing corporation was a director of the bank prohibit that corporation from withdrawing the money it had on deposit if the bank's assets were less than its liabilities? That question, presented under circumstances of conceded and known insolvency, arose in the very recent case of O'Brien v. East River Bridge Co. 164 N. Y.—, 56 N. E. 74. In that case a director of a bank, being also the president of the bridge company, became aware of the impending insolvency of the bank, whereupon the check of the bridge company for the sum of $50,000, being the balance to its credit in the bank, was drawn and was signed by the president of the bridge company, who was also a director in the bank. The full amount was secured in payment of the check on the same day that the bank was closed. It was held, in a suit by the receivers of the bank against the bridge company, that the transaction was not void under the stock corporation law (§ 48), which prohibited an insolvent corporation, its officers and directors, from making any assignment or payment with intent to give a preference to a particular creditor, since there was nothing in that provision to prevent a depositing corporation from withdrawing its money on information of the bank's insolvency received by its president in his capacity as director in the bank. It is not necessary for the decision of the case at bar to go that length. If the receivers had sued the Citizens' National Bank to recover from it the $5,000 paid to it in settlement of the call-loan note, would they not have been confronted with and defeated by the case of McDonald v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 174 U. S. 610, 43 L. ed. 1106, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 787? If the payment was made in the ordinary course of business, it was not a preference, and the money could not have been recovered from the Citizens' Bank. Upon what principle, then, can the indorsers be made to pay to the receivers the money which was lawfully paid to the Citizens' Bank, and which the latter, if sued by the receivers, could retain as against them? If the Citizens' Bank could retain the money, it is because the payment to it was lawful; and, if the payment to it was lawful, how can the indorsers of the note, who were only responsible to all, in the event that the note was not paid by the South Baltimore Bank, be made liable to the receivers because the note was paid, and lawfully paid, by the South Baltimore Bank? If the payment was lawful, the indorsers cannot be held liable upon the theory that it was unlawful. Sanford Fork & Tool Co. v. Howe, B. & Co. 157 U. S. 312, 39 L. ed. 713, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621. Undoubtedly there are cases to be found in the books where directors of an insolvent corporation, who are also indorsers of its paper, have been denied preferences secured by themselves at the expense of other creditors; and in many of the opinions delivered in those cases very broad language has been used. But those cases could not be applied 49 L. R. A.

in this state without departing from or greatly extending the trust-fund doctrine as understood in Maryland. It must be borne in mind that, while there are vague allegations of fraud, there is not the slightest evidence to support them; and the proof is clear and conclusive that not a person connected with the South Baltimore Bank had a suspicion that it was insolvent until Schott so informed Cahill at 5 o'clock on the evening of February 23, long after these impeached transactions had occurred, and had been closed. Not even Schott pretends that the bank was insolvent in the commercial sense of the term. The answer of the bank to the bill for a receiver admits insolvency, but obviously in the same sense that Schott understood it; because that is the kind of insolvency charged in the bill,—a deficit in the assets, but not an inability to pay demands in the ordinary course of business as they fell due. It would be impossible, in the limits of an opinion, to review all the cases cited in the brief of the learned counsel for the appellees. To a great extent they involve different principles from the one now under discussion. For example, Hoffman Steam Coal Co. v. Cumberland Coal & I. Co. 16 Md. 456, 77 Am. Dec. 311, did not present a question of preference, but a question of fraud. It did not involve the relation of a director towards a creditor, but the relation of a director towards the company. It concerned, not the payment by the company to a director of a bona fide debt, but the fraudulent acquisition of the company's property by the director. The question there and the question here are not analogous, but depend on entirely different principles. In Sventzel v. Penn Bank, 147 Pa. 140, 15 L. R. A. 305, 23 Atl. 405, 415, the money was drawn after the bank had suspended payment. In Brown v. Morristown Co-op. Store Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 42 S. W. 161, the corporation was insolvent when it sold all of its assets to its secretary in payment of a debt. Before the sale the directors had determined to quit the business because of insolvency, and the secretary knew this. Of course, the sale, in such circumstances, was invalid. Cases not in line with the doctrine laid down in Fear v. Bartlett, 81 Md. 443, 33 L. R. A. 721, 32 Atl. 322, would not be followed in Maryland, and need not be discussed.

If the two transactions assailed in these proceedings are not invalid because not in conflict with the trust-fund doctrine, are they void because contravening some positive statute? Section 14, art. 47, of the Code, as amended by Act 1896, chap. 446, declares that "no deed, or conveyance executed, or lien created, by any person being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency . . . shall be lawful or valid if the same shall contain any preferences, . . . and all preferences . . . shall be void, howsoever the same be made; provided" the party creating them be proceeded against in a certain way, and within a certain time, and be declared, or becomes "under the provisions of this article, an insolvent." This provision of the insolvent law would have had no application to a corporation (Ellicott v. Search, 72 Md. 25, 18 Atl. 863) had it not been for act 1896, chap. 349. By that act a new section, known as "section 264a," was added to article 23 of the Code, relating to corporations. It provides that, "whenever any corporation mentioned in section 264 of this article . . . shall have been determined or proven to be insolvent as in said section 264 stated, all payments, conveyances and assignments of money, property, debts or claims of said corporation and all preferences howsoever made by it, or by any of its officers on its behalf, which would be void or fraudulent if the same had been made by a natural person who had become an insolvent under article 47 of the Code, . . . shall to the like extent and with like remedies, be fraudulent and void when made by such corporation or by any of its officers on its behalf, and whenever any such corporation shall have been adjudged to be dissolved as provided in the next preceding section, . . . all of its property and assets of every description shall be distributed to the creditors of said corporation; . . . and the receiver of such corporation shall have the same power and authority to maintain suits and proceedings to set aside preferences . . . as the permanent trustee of an insolvent debtor has under article 47 of the Code, . . . and the date of the filing of the bill against such corporation, upon which it may be dissolved, shall be taken and treated for the purpose of determining the validity of preferences . . . as the date of the filing of the petition in insolvency by or against a natural person." Section 264 of article 23, referred to in the above provision, declares, as amended by act 1894, chap. 263, that "whenever any corporation in this state shall have been determined by legal proceedings to be insolvent, or shall be proved to be insolvent by proof offered under any bill filed under the provisions of this section, it shall be deemed to have surrendered its corporate rights, privileges, and franchises, and may be adjudged to be dissolved after the hearing, according to the practice of the courts of equity in this state, upon a bill filed for that purpose" in the proper tribunal. This collocation of the statutes discloses two things: First. That while a corporation cannot be proceeded against under the insolvent laws, its transactions may be dealt with when it is proceeded against according to the terms of the act of 1896,—that is, § 264a,—precisely as the same transactions of an individual may be treated if he were proceeded against under the insolvent laws. Secondly. That the provisions of the act of 1896 or § 264a can only be availed of when the proceedings against the corporation have been taken under § 264 of article 23 of the Code as amended by the act of 1894. Now, as to the application of these two propositions, in their inverse order, to the pending cases. What is the proceeding for which § 264 makes provision? Its terms furnish the most satisfactory answer: "Whenever any corporation shall have been determined by legal proceedings to be insolvent, or shall be proved to be insolvent by proof offered under any bill filed under the provisions of this section, it . . . may be adjudged to be dissolved . . . upon a bill filed for that purpose." When either of these two things occurs,—that is, when a corporation has been determined by legal proceedings to be insolvent, or when it has been proved to be insolvent under a bill filed under this section,—then it may be adjudged to be dissolved upon a bill filed for that purpose. Obviously, then, there must be a bill filed for the purpose of having it dissolved, and that relief can only be granted when insolvency has been established in one or the other of the two modes indicated. When the dissolution prayed for—when the dissolution which is the purpose for which the bill has been filed—has been decreed, then, by the express terms of the act of 1896 or § 264a, the assets shall be distributed "and the receiver . . . shall have the same power . . . to maintain suits . . . to set aside preferences . . . as the permanent trustee of an insolvent debtor has under article 47 of the Code," but not until such a decree has been passed. Now, the bill which was filed against the South Baltimore Bank, and under which the receivers were appointed, nowhere prays for a dissolution of the corporation. It was not "a bill filed for that purpose;" and, as it was not a bill filed for that purpose, the subsequent decree dissolving the corporation under a bill which did not pray for that relief at all does not bring the assailed preferences within the terms of the act of 1896, and they are not, therefore, such preferences as that act denounces, or such as the receivers may assail. The jurisdiction conferred by the act of 1896 is special, and must be strictly pursued. 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 277, note 1. But, even if the statute of 1896 (§ 264a) were applicable, are these payments preferences within the meaning of § 14 of article 47 of the Code,—the article relating to insolvency? Any transfer made by a debtor, and, of course, any payment made by him, he "being then actually insolvent, or contemplating such state of insolvency, with a view to secure his property, or any part of it, to one or more creditors, and thus prevent an equal distribution among all his creditors, is a transfer [or a payment] in fraud of the insolvent law." Castleberg v. Wheeler, 68 Md. 277, 12 Atl. 3. There must be insolvency, or a contemplation of insolvency, and there must be a transfer or payment with a view—that is, with an intent—to secure a particular creditor to the detriment of other creditors. When a debtor who knows that he is insolvent makes a payment or a transfer which operates to prevent an equal distribution of his assets among all his creditors, he is, in law, presumed to have intended to create a preference, because a preference is the natural and necessary result of such an act; and he is held to have intended to bring about the natural and the necessary consequence of the act which he deliberately did. But, if a debtor honestly believes himself to be solvent, he rebuts the presumption of intent to prefer which arises from the fact of actual insolvency. Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. 40, 20 L. ed. 481. An intent to prefer cannot be predicated of a payment made in total ignorance of insolvency. So it comes to the question: Was the bank insolvent within the meaning of act 1896, chap. 349, and of § 264, art. 23, of the Code, when the payments were made? The decree of June 1 does not answer that inquiry. The question is not whether Cahill and the directors had actual knowledge, or were bound to know, and therefore were chargeable with constructive knowledge, that the value of the assets was less than the sum of the liabilities; for, as already pointed out, that is not the test of insolvency under the insolvent law, and it ought not to be the test under the act of 1896 and § 264 of article 23 of the Code. By the national banking act of 1864 it was provided that all payments of money made by a national banking association to its shareholders or creditors after the commission of an act of insolvency, or when in contemplation of insolvency, with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, "shall be utterly null and void." It was held in Case v. Citizens' Bank, 2 Woods, 23, Fed. Cas. No. 2,489; Morse, Banks & Banking 576,—that the word "insolvency" in this statute had the same meaning as in the national bankrupt act, and that it meant a present inability to pay in the ordinary course of business. Obviously, by analogy the same meaning should be given to the word "insolvency" in the act of 1896 and in § 264 of article 23 as this court ascribed to it in the insolvent law, for the act of 1896, though amendatory of the general corporation law, is in fact supplementary to the insolvent system. Was the bank, then, unable to pay its debts when due, in the ordinary course of business? This question has been already answered in the negative in defining what was meant by insolvency, and it need not be repeated here. It is sufficient to say that there is not a particle of evidence in the record to show that it was unable to continue in business, or to meet every demand made on it in the usual course; and there is absolutely nothing from which it could be inferred that these payments were made in contemplation of insolvency, for they were not made in contemplation of stopping business because of insolvency. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 785. There is, however, most abundant evidence to prove that its officers honestly believed it to be perfectly solvent until misled by Schott late on the afternoon of February 23d. It would be an exceedingly harsh and a hitherto untried construction of the insolvent law and of the act of 1896 to hold, because subsequent efforts to realize the cash from some of the investments showed a shrinkage in the value of the assets below the aggregate of the indebtedness, that, therefore, though the same condition had existed for four years previously, the bank, notwithstanding it was a going and apparently a prospering concern, was insolvent when these payments were made, and that the directors ought to have known that it was. As there was no such insolvency when the receiver was appointed as the statute takes cognizance of, the payments made were not preferences which the insolvent law denounces; and, as there is no other statute prohibiting them, it follows that they were not made in contravention of any legislative enactment. These payments, then, not having been made in breach of any settled equitable principle, and not having been made in violation of any statute, were not prohibited preferences, and the receivers ought not to be allowed to recover them. It results, therefore, that the decree below which directed the James Clark Company and Cahill in the one case, and Cahill and Denny (Storey being dead) in the other case, to pay over to the receivers the money claimed under the bills filed against them respectively is wrong, and ought to be reversed, and that the bills ought both to be dismissed. This is the conclusion which a careful examination of the case has forced upon me, and I do not see how, entertaining the views I have expressed, I can escape dissenting from the judgment of the majority of my brothers. There are many other cases I might cite, but it is not necessary.

I. General rules.

Persons are justified in assuming greater risks to protect human life than would be sanctioned under other circumstances. Schroeder v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 108 Mo. 322, 18 L. R. A. 527, 18 S. W. 1094.

2. Going into a trench filled with deadly gas, negligently left in a public street by a municipality, to rescue one who, having gone there to recover an article accidentally dropped, has been overcome by the gas, is not, as a matter of law, such negligence as will relieve the municipality from liability for the rescuer's death in case he also is overcome and dies.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for impending danger. Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 28 N. E. 172; Peyton v. Texas & P. R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 561, 6 So. 690; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35; CORBIN v. PHILADELPHIA.

Unless the effort is made under such circumstances as to constitute recklessness and rashness in the judgment of men of ordinary prudence. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35; Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 28 N. E. 172.

And one who voluntarily incurs peril caused by the negligence of another, in order to save the lives of persons imperiled by such negligence, is not debarred from recovery for injuries received therefrom on the ground of contributory negligence. Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 88 Md. 482, 42 L. R. A. 842, 42 Atl. 60.

And where a man, acting as a reasonable man would ordinarily act under the circumstances, voluntarily places himself in a position of danger in the hope of saving his property from probable injury, and of preventing probable injury to lives or person or property of others, and sustains injury himself, the person whose negligent act has brought about the dangerous situation is responsible in damages. Connell v. Prescott, 20 Ont. App. Rep. 49.

The proximate cause of injury to one who voluntarily interposes to save the lives of persons in peril by the negligence of another is the negligence which causes the peril, and not the act of interposition to save lives. Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 88 Md. 482, 42 L. R. A. 842, 42 Atl. 60.

And an injury received by one who risks his own safety or life in attempting to rescue another from impending danger, if he does not rashly and unnecessarily expose himself to danger, should be attributed to the party who negligently or wrongfully exposed to danger the person who required assistance. Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 28 N. E. 172.

The law has so high a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under such circumstances as to constitute rashness in the judgment of prudent persons. Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. 43 N. Y. 503, 3 Am. Rep. 721; Condiff v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 45 Kan. 256, 25 Pac. 562.

And the knowledge of one workman of the incompetency of another does not make his interposition to save life endangered by the negligence of the incompetent workman, negligence 49 L. R. A.

the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's son. Reversed.

Mr. Rudolph M. Schick, for appellant:

Whenever the standard of duty shifts, not according to any fixed rule, but with the facts and circumstances developed at the trial, the question of negligence cannot be determined by the court, but must be submitted to the jury. Negligence is the absence of care according to the circumstances, and is always a question for the jury when there is a reasonable doubt as to the facts, or as to the inferences to be drawn from them.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Peters, 116 Pa. 215, 9 Atl. 317.

The holes were dug under a contract with the city. The city is therefore chargeable with notice.

per se. Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 88 Md. 482, 42 L. R. A. 842, 42 Atl. 60.

Risking one's life in an effort to save the life of another cannot be said to be a rash or reckless act if the appearances justify a belief that he can effect a rescue, even though he shall also have reason to believe, and in fact does believe, that he may fail and receive grievous injury himself. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35.

And the courts will not scan closely the grounds of hope a person may have in going into danger in order to save others, risking himself in the effort, where the exigency demands instantaneous decision and action. Central R. Co. v. Crosby, 74 Ga. 737, 58 Am. Rep. 463.

While one who rashly and unnecessarily exposes himself to danger cannot recover damages for injuries thus brought upon himself, where another is in great and imminent danger, one who attempts a rescue may be warranted by surrounding circumstances in exposing his limbs or life to a very high degree of danger; and in such cases he should not be charged with the consequences of errors of judgment resulting from the excitement and confusion of the moment. Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 28 N. E. 172.

The question whether one who voluntarily risks his own safety or life in attempting to rescue another from impending danger is chargeable with contributory negligence, in an action brought by him to recover damages for injuries received in attempting the rescue, is one of mixed law and fact, and should be submitted to the jury upon the evidence, with proper instructions from the court. Ibid.

And when an exposure to danger is for the purpose of saving human life, it is for the jury to say, from all the circumstances of the case, whether the conduct of the person injured is to be deemed rash and reckless so as to bar a recovery for injuries received. Condiff v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 45 Kan. 256, 25 Pac. 562.

A different rule, however, has been laid down in Michigan and in Canada, in Blair v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 60 Mich. 124, 26 N. W. 855, and Anderson v. Northern R. Co. 25 U. C. C. P. 301, infra, II. But see also, as to the Canada rule, Connell v. Prescott, 20 Ont. App. Rep. 49, infra, II.

Morrill, City Neg. p. 17; Brusso v. Buffalo, 90 N. Y. 679.

The city was negligent in not having filled or covered the holes, and in permitting them to remain in that dangerous condition, unguarded.

Corbin was not guilty of contributory negligence.

It is impossible to say what was Corbin's knowledge of the conditions, but we have, first, the absence of evidence that he knew of the presence of gas in the trench, and the presumption that he would not have entered the trench if he had seen that he would certainly meet his death there. This presumption throws the burden on defendant of proving that he was reckless in going.

Weiss v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 79 Pa. 387.

We have, second, the fact that a number of other persons are proved to have gone into that trench and come out without injury, before and at the time he lost his life. Therefore it was fair for him to presume, if he had any knowledge of the gas, that he could do the same. The necessity for prompt decision, and want of opportunity to make a full investigation of the circumstances, are held in all the cases to be an element in determining this question.

Though in the above case, it was said that cases may possibly arise in which the common prudence of an engineer might require him to leave his engine to escape danger, but such cases will be rare exceptions and depend upon very peculiar circumstances.

But if it was not thus necessary to remain, and he knew it, or ought to have known it, and he still remained, no recovery can be had. Central R. Co. v. Crosby, 74 Ga. 737, 58 Am. Rep. 463.

So, one who sees a small child upon a railroad track, who, if not immediately rescued, must be inevitably crushed by a rapidly approaching train, is in duty bound to make every effort in his power to rescue the child, compatible with a reasonable regard for his own safety; and he is not guilty of contributory negligence which will bar a recovery for an injury to himself where he goes to the child and seizes it and throws it clear of the track on the opposite side, but is himself struck by the engine or tender, where from appearances he believed that he could save the child, though believing that possibly he might fall and receive injury himself. Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. 43 N. Y. 503, 3 Am. Rep. 721, Affirming 57 Barb. 553; Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 28 N. E. 172.

And a girl at a railway station, who sees smaller children playing upon the track, and sees a train at a station about half a mile away coming toward them, knowing that it is coming, and knowing that it moves swiftly, and that the little children playing on the track are in danger, who goes upon the track in a humane effort to save the younger children from danger, is not a trespasser; and where her foot is caught and fastened between the rail and the planks at a crossing, and she is injured, her act in going upon the track is not contributory negligence which will bar a recovery for the injury. Spooner v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 22, 21 N. E. 696, 49 L. R. A.

And an instruction in an action against a railroad company for running over and killing a person who went upon the track to save the life of a child, which required or tended to require the jury to find the deceased guilty of contributory negligence, though they might also have believed that she was at no fault in going upon the track, is improper as tending to mislead the jury. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35.

And a replication in such an action to a plea of contributory negligence, that the deceased was killed in an effort to save a child on a railroad track, is not insufficient for not showing that the attempt of the deceased to save the life of the child was not so rash or reckless that a prudent man would not have made it, as against a general demurrer. Ibid.

And an instruction in such an action, that if the jury believes from the evidence that the child which was in company with the deceased was of such mental and physical vigor as to be able to avoid danger without the aid or assistance of the deceased, and that deceased saw defendant's engine and train before she reached the track, the verdict should be for the defendant, is improper as being abstract, in the absence of evidence in the case that the child was of sufficient mental and physical development to avoid the danger to which it was exposed. Ibid.

So, one who went upon a railroad track at a temporary station and pushed a friend in an inebriated condition in dangerous proximity to an approaching train, off the track, and was himself struck by the pilot-beam of the locomotive and injured thereby, is not guilty of contributory negligence which will bar a recovery for such injuries, where he was a man of more than ordinary strength, and believed that he could save the man and avoid injury himself, and could have done so had the train been running at a reasonable and proper rate of speed. Peyton v. Texas & P. R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 861, 6 So. 600.

Nor is a mother guilty of such negligence in going to the rescue of her child whom she discovers in contact with a live electric wire, by reason of which she is injured, however dangerous and desperate the act may have been. *Walters v. own child who avoided her, when, in following it, her foot was caught in the rail and she was thrown down and struck by the train and killed, and the arm of the child was seriously injured, though negligence, is not contributory negligence which will discharge the railroad company, which had been negligent in running at a high rate of speed without a proper outlook, from liability for injury to the child. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Mahoney, 67 Pa. 187.

So, an unsafe bridge is in a legal and judicial sense the cause of the drowning of a father, as well as his child, where the father was drowned while trying to save the child, which had fallen into the water in consequence of a defect in the bridge. Gibney v. State, 137 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 365, 33 N. E. 142.

And where parents accompanied by a small child stop to talk with an acquaintance upon a bridge, and the child remains within a few feet of them, but suddenly falls through an opening in the railing of the bridge into the canal below, and the father, as soon as he discovers that the boy is gone, plunges into the canal to rescue him and both father and son are drowned, the death of both the child and the parent is the proximate consequence of the negligence of the state in permitting the bridge to remain in an unsafe condition, as the peril to which the father exposed himself was the natural consequence of the situation. Ibid.

And a mother who, in her efforts to protect her four-year-old child, who had slipped on a sidewalk and fallen in front of a hatch-way, herself fell into the hatch-way, cannot be deemed to have been guilty of contributory negligence in having gone upon the unprotected side of the hatch-way in order to catch the child, though the hatch-way was properly constructed and protected on all sides except next to the curb, where ordinarily it would have been negligence to go. Clark v. Famous Shoe & Clothing Co. 16 Mo. App. 463.

So, the exposure of life by an employee of a railroad company or other employer to save life is neither wrongful nor negligent when attempted within the scope of the employee's duty, and if made under such circumstances as not to constitute rashness in the judgment of prudent persons. Condif v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 45 Kan. 256, 25 Pac. 562.

And the act of a skilled workman in a foundry in which iron castings are made, having charge of the furnace from which the metal is drawn through an orifice called a tap hole whenever required for the molder, who attempts to prevent the consequences of the negligence of the person in charge of the tap hole by himself attempting to stop it, and who is burned while so doing, does not constitute contributory negligence, which will bar a recovery against the owners of the furnace for the injury, where there are other workmen in close proximity to the furnace who will be seriously injured, if not killed, as the result of the failure of the incompetent workman to properly stop the tap hole. Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 88 Md. 482, 42 L. R. A. 842, 42 Atl. 60.

So, in Schroeder v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 108 Mo. 322, 18 L. R. A. 827, 18 S. W. 1094, a workman assisting in running a hand car was held not to be guilty of contributory negligence so as to bar a recovery, where, upon seeing a train approaching, the persons in charge stopped the hand car and began to lift it from the track, but did not get the car off, and when the engine was about 60 feet from them the foreman called to the men to get out of the way, and all escaped except the plaintiff, who stumbled and fell near the track, and, on rising to his feet, was struck by the hand car as the latter was thrown one side by the passing locomotive, and both his legs were broken.

The question, however, whether a person injured by an approaching train in an effort to get a hand car off the track had reason to suppose that if the hand car was left upon the track it would throw the train off the track, and whether he knew that there was anyone upon the train who was likely to be injured in consequence of such occurrence, so as to warrant his remaining upon the track in order to save life, is one of fact for the jury, in an action for the injuries received. Roll v. Northern C. R. Co. 15 Hun, 496, Affirmed in 80 N. Y. 647.

And the question of the contributory negligence of one who, hearing cries for help, turns a corner and sees a man on his back in the roadway, holding a bull by a rope attached to a ring in his nose, the bull attempting to gore him, himself goes near the bull, but not attempting to assist the man, when the bull rushes upon and gores him, is properly left to the jury, in an action against the owner of the bull for the injury. *Linnehan v. A deliberate resolve, upon the part of any individual, to do that which is not according to the proper use or treatment of things, breaks the causal connection between the existing conditions which such individual makes the means or location of his act and the accident, so that those conditions are not the proximate cause of any ensuing injury to such individual.

The plaintiff voluntarily assumed the danger, when it was obvious and palpable, to rescue another whose peril was incurred by going where he knew his presence was necessarily outside of all contemplation by the parties in charge.

An injury incurred by a chance rescuer, in the effort to achieve that object, is not the proximate result of the original negligence, but of the positive intent of such individual. Such a person is entitled to the plaudits of the community if the attempt is not a reckless one, but not to exact damages for that which he courted by his act.

run-away team, will not bar a recovery for an injury received in trying to stop the horses, though in seeking to lay hold of them he exposed himself to danger, and though the position he left was one of safety. Connell v. Prescott, 20 Ont. App. Rep. 49.

In the above case Anderson v. Northern R. Co. 25 U. C. C. P. 301, infra, was distinguished, and said to be of no authority, whether rightly or wrongly decided, in the case at bar, as an outsider or stranger rushing into imminent danger to save life or property cannot be likened to a case in which the owner, according to his duty, endeavored to stop his own run-away team of which he was in charge.

In Blair v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 60 Mich. 124, 26 N. W. 855, however, it was held that a person not connected with the railroad company in any way, who went upon request of a watchman to stop a construction train which was soon to arrive, and inform the conductor of a broken rail, while the watchman went in the opposite direction to stop a train from that direction, and, after giving the proper signal a number of times in plain view of the conductor, and believing that the conductor was not going to stop, but was going on to the place of danger, he undertook to get onto the forward platform of the car for the purpose of giving information of the danger, and was violently thrown down and injured, is guilty not only of want of ordinary care, but gross negligence amounting to extreme rashness and recklessness, which would prevent a recovery.

And in Anderson v. Northern R. Co. 25 U. C. C. P. 301, it was held that the act of a man passing along a wharf in a safe position, upon which were laid three railroad tracks occupying nearly the whole surface of the wharf, in hurrying to the rescue of a woman who, passing down the wharf and stepping aside to avoid meeting a number of men, stepped in front of an approaching train upon one of the tracks, and would have been run over but for his assistance, who was himself struck by the train and killed, was the direct and proximate cause of his death, and that whatever sympathies it and its melancholy results may appeal to, it was a negligent act which would bar a recovery of damages therefor, though the persons operating the train were also negligent.

In the above case, Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. 43 N. Y. 502, 3 Am. Rep. 721, supra, was criticised by Strong, J., saying that he felt constrained to say that the legal reasoning of the dissenting minority commends itself much more strongly to his mind than that contained in the judgment of the court; and also by 49 L. R. A.

Draper, Ch. J., saying that the court could not perceive what bearing the observation made in the case, that the deceased owed a duty to the child to rescue it from its extreme peril if he could do so without incurring great danger to himself, had on the case, unless legal obligation was meant; and again, that the obligation is limited by the condition "without incurring great danger to himself," and that in the opinion of the court the loss of life proves the great danger incurred; and it would seem to follow that the condition attaching to the obligation was annulled, so that in voluntarily running the risk the deceased became contributory to the loss of his life.

III. Exceptions.

Voluntarily incurring danger is justifiable so as not to constitute contributory negligence only when it is for the purpose of saving life; if the purpose is to save property only, the rule does not apply.

Thus, a foreman upon a hand car, who refuses to leave the track or the hand car upon the approach of a locomotive, is guilty of contributory negligence which will bar a recovery for injuries received, unless it appears that his motive was to save life, and not merely to protect property, and that his efforts to do so were not such as to constitute rashness on his part in the judgment of prudent persons. Condliff v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 45 Kan. 256, 25 Pac. 562.

And one of several persons in charge of a hand car, who sees a train approaching, cannot recover if he remains on the track in an effort to get the hand car off of the track, until he is struck by the approaching train, if his object was simply to save the property of the company for which he worked; but the rule would be different if he did it for the purpose of saving human life, or some human being from injury. Roll v. Northern C. R. Co. 15 Hun, 496, Affirmed in 80 N. Y. 647.

But see Connell v. Prescott, 20 Ont. App. Rep. 49, supra, II.

So, responsibility for an injury received by one who voluntarily incurs danger to save another attaches only when the peril of the person sought to be saved was caused by negligence.

And in order to prevent the act of a person who places himself in a position of peril to rescue another who is in danger, from constituting contributory negligence on his part which will bar a recovery for an injury received by him in so doing, it must appear that the party

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The son of plaintiff lost his life in going to the rescue of an imperiled fellow being. He bravely descended into danger, and found awaiting him the death from which he would have saved another. The endangered boy came back from his peril and lived. And we must now determine whether the mother of the deceased can be pecuniarily compensated for the loss she has sustained, or must be content with the consolation that her son died a heroic death. She makes a claim against the city of Philadelphia, alleging that its negligence was responsible for the damages she has suffered; and, unless sufficient proof to sustain her allegation was submitted to the jury, she cannot recover. The primary question involved is the alleged negligence of the city; for, if it was "guiltless of all wrong," it is not liable to her, and, no matter how heroically her son may have given up his own life in going down into danger to save another, her appeal to the law to compel the appellee to compensate her is in vain. The learned trial judge, after the testimony on each side had been submitted to the jury, directed a verdict for the defendant; giving no reasons for so taking the case from their consideration. His judgment may have been that there was no sufficient evidence to establish the negligence of the defendant, or he may have thought that, even if the city was negligent, the rescuer's conduct was such as to prevent a recovery. To properly dispose of this appeal, we must pass upon both these questions, and first take up what we have said is the primary one: reviewing the evidence, in the light of which must be found the right of the plaintiff, or the immunity of the defendant.

In the summer of 1896 the city of Philadelphia had dug several trenches on the north side of Clearfield street, west of Fifth street, in an attempt to locate an old sewer that had against whom recovery is sought was guilty of negligence by reason of which the person was placed in peril. Hirschman v. Dry-Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 61 N. Y. Supp. 304.

And a railroad company injuring a mother while she was attempting to rescue her child, which was upon the railroad track in front of an approaching train, is not chargeable with her injury unless it was guilty of negligence with respect to the child before the mother attempted its rescue, or with respect to the mother or the child after her efforts to save the child commenced. Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 560, 53 Am. Rep. 594.

To hold a railroad company liable for an injury received in an effort to rescue a child from being run over by an approaching engine it must appear that the child was in danger of being run over and injured, and such danger was caused by the negligence of the railroad company, and that in making the effort to rescue the child the rescuer was not guilty of contributory negligence. Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 28 N. E. 172.

The negligence of railroad operatives in not seeing a child on its track upon which an engine was approaching, as to the child in danger, is imputed to the company with respect to him who attempts the rescue, and if not guilty of negligence as to such person, then it is only liable for negligence occurring with regard to the rescuer after his efforts to rescue the child had commenced. Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 560, 53 Am. Rep. 594.

And a mother, whose small child ran unexpectedly upon a street-car track, and so close to a rapidly approaching car that the driver had no opportunity to take any steps to stop the car or to save the child from injury, who ran after the child, and, being unable to reach it, seized the horses by their heads and attempted to stop them, and was thrown down and seriously hurt, is not entitled to go to the jury upon the question as to whether or not her act constituted contributory negligence, in the absence of any evidence which might have warranted the jury in concluding that the driver of the car was guilty of any negligence. Hirschman v. Dry-Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 61 N. Y. Supp. 304.

So, in Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684, a recovery for the death of a person who approached a vault in the process of construction to aid another person who had fallen into it in response to his cries for help, and himself fell into it and was killed, was refused, where the vault was within the lines of the owner's property upon which it was situated, and the undisputed facts proved him to have been guiltless of all wrong.

And in Evanville & C. R. Co. v. Hiatt, 17 Ind. 102, a young man who was walking along a railway track with his father and others, and who stepped off the track on the approach of a train, but, seeing that his father did not step off, hastened back and seized him and took him off, but failed to clear the track himself, and was struck by the train, and one of his legs was fractured so badly that it had to be amputated, was held not entitled to recover for his injuries, where the railroad operatives, after they discovered the condition of the persons on the track, were guilty of no neglect in trying to avoid a collision.

IV. Effect of previous contributory negligence.

The rule has been laid down that the contributory negligence of parents in permitting been constructed many feet below the surface of the street. After having excavated to the depth of 23 feet, according to the testimony of John Abel, called as a witness by the city, the effort to find the sewer was abandoned, because the gas had become so strong at that depth that workmen could no longer remain at the bottom of the trenches. The clear preponderance of the testimony is that, for several days before Corbin went down to his death in one of these trenches, work had been abandoned by the city, for the reason stated; and it seems to be equally clear that the ordinary safeguards to protect the passing public from falling into these holes had not been provided, though the absence of such protection is not material in determining the questions that confront us. The plaintiff makes no claim that she lost the supporting arm of her son because he had fallen into a hole or ditch negligently left unguarded by the city, with no notice to the passer-by that a pitfall was before him; but her complaint is that, though these trenches were open and notorious, avoidable by all who traveled the street, no sign had been made, no warning given, of the death which the city knew lurked below, and to which at any time the unsuspecting might descend. These trenches had been dug in a street in a populous portion of the city. A church attended by six or seven hundred children was within 100 feet of them, and a public school house within a square. At the time Corbin met his death it was vacation, and the school building was closed; but the lot on the north side of Clearfield street, immediately north of these trenches, extending a whole square, from Fifth street to Sixth street, was open, having no buildings on it, and was used as a playground. Boys were constantly playing ball upon it, and on Saturdays, after the factories had closed, hundreds of tired men and boys went to it for the recreation found in their innocent games. Under these admitted conditions, the trenches were dug, and work finally suspended upon them on account of the deadly gas that had accumulated at the bottom. This the city knew, and, apparently, for days; but it gave no notice to the passer-by of the danger in these holes, and the hundreds who congregated on the adjoining playground had no warning that it might mean to go down to death, to go after a ball which in their sports might be accidentally batted or thrown into the trenches. On the afternoon of August 5, 1896, boys were playing ball on this vacant lot, and their ball rolled down into one of these trenches. Corbin, the deceased, who, with a companion, was near, said, "Let us get the ball for the poor boys," and walked over to the trench. Before reaching it, however a boy named Walker had gone down to get the ball; there having been crosspieces of wood in the trench, from side to side, making practically a ladder to the bottom. The boy Walker, after reaching the bottom, got the ball, and started to ascend; but, when he had reached the first crosspiece, fell back, with his face to the ground. Corbin then went down to his a child to be on a railroad track in front of an approaching train will not prevent a recovery of damages for an injury to the mother, inflicted while she was attempting the rescue of the child. Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 560, 53 Am. Rep. 594.

And where the engineer upon a railroad train saw women and children near the track from a point one fourth of a mile distant, and immediately afterwards he saw the women go upon the track and run towards the train waving their hands and a red shawl, and after seeing this could have stopped or so checked the speed of the train that the mother of the child upon the track in front of the approaching train could have rescued the child and not herself been struck by the engine, the parents are entitled to recover whether they were guilty of contributory negligence in permitting the child to be upon the track or not, provided the mother was not guilty of rashness in the attempt to save the child. Ibid.

But in DeMahy v. Morgan's Louisiana & T. R. & S. S. Co. 45 La. Ann. 1329, 14 So. 61, in which a mother and her child of two years and eleven months were upon a car left standing with others on a side track, and the child, after passing out upon the platform of the car, was thrown off between that and the next car by a jolt caused by coupling other cars with the ones thus standing, when the mother jumped to the ground and thrust her arm under the still moving cars to reach and protect the child, pushing it off of the rail, and in so doing her arm was caught and badly broken by one of the wheels, it was said that in her efforts to guard and save her child she was not to blame, and that her conduct commanded the highest admiration; but a recovery for the injury done to the mother was denied upon the ground of contributory negligence on her part in allowing the child to go upon the platform.

The wantonness and wilfulness of a person, however, in exposing himself to danger in going upon a railroad track to rescue a child, is no defense to a charge that the railway company's employees wantonly and wilfully ran over and killed her. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35.

And an instruction, in an action against a railroad company for killing a person who was attempting to rescue a child upon the track, that if the jury believes from the evidence that the deceased was endeavoring to rescue the child from being run over by the approaching train under such circumstances as to constitute rashness or recklessness in the judgment of a prudent person, and was in such endeavor struck and killed by the train, her actions would amount to contributory negligence, is improper as requiring a verdict on contributory negligence, even though the defendant was guilty of wantonness. Ibid.

V. Summary.

The general rule is that voluntarily incurring danger to save the life of another is not contributory negligence, at least not per se, if not recklessly or rashly done, though there is a contrary holding in Michigan and in Canada. The design must have been to save life, however, as distinguished from an attempt to save property, and there must have been negligence causing the peril from which the imperiled person is sought to be saved. The question of contributory negligence, as well as of rashness or recklessness, is one of fact for the jury.

rescue, but was overcome by the gas and died. Walker revived, came to the top unassisted, and walked away.

It is insisted that the city of Philadelphia was not bound to anticipate the descent of anyone into this danger, and, therefore, not negligent in failing to adopt proper means for the exclusion of all persons from these holes. We cannot sustain this view. If the city was negligent, it was liable for the consequences of its neglect, though those consequences were not, and could not by any ordinary prudence have been, anticipated. Oil City Gas Co. v. Robinson, 99 Pa. 1. These trenches were across a public street, along which men and women daily passed, and with no notice or warning of the deadly danger below; and, with the easy means of descent, can it be seriously questioned that the city ought not to have anticipated that what did happen might happen? Ought it not reasonably to have been anticipated that, if the hat of a passer-by should be carried by the wind from his head to the bottom of one of these holes, he would most naturally go or send someone down to recover it? The veil or handkerchief of a passing woman might be blown into the trench, and he who would not anticipate her clamor that someone go down and get it for her, and that chivalrous response would be instantly made, knows little of human nature. Under the circumstances, the city ought to have anticipated descents into these holes; but we need not conjecture what its anticipations ought to have been, for, before Walker went down to get the ball, others had been down. Stromen testifies that he went down to get a ball on the Tuesday before Corbin's death, and Roth states that he had seen a boy go down for a ball, "to the last round, and get the ball." Stromen says he did not stay long, on account of the gas; that a funny feeling came over him, and he had a "hard time" getting up. Emil Hagan says he saw a boy go down before August 5. Why should Stromen and these boys not have gone down for the ball? The amusement and recreation of playing ball were lawful, and the probabilities that the ball might be knocked or thrown into the trench were great; but the city had given no warning of the danger, and perhaps death, which, according to the testimony submitted, it must have known were at the bottom of the hole. If it is true, as has often been said, that circumstances beget duties, the duty of the city, after discovering the dangerous gas in the trenches, and its effect upon the workmen, was, clearly, to give notice and warning of it to the public, and to promptly take steps to prevent a descent into it, not unlikely to occur at any time, from causes already suggested, and others that might be mentioned.

In Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332, there was a platform in a private alley communicating with a public street. This platform was raised and lowered for the convenience of the company in receiving and shipping goods, and, when not in use, was kept in place by inclining against the wall, without any fastening. At the entrance to the alley were gates, which were opened and shut, as necessity required, and upon them was posted: "Private. No admittance;" and yet, a child having strayed into this private alley, and having been caught under the platform, which tilted over on it, in an action brought by the parents to recover damages for its death it was held that the negligence of the company was properly submitted to the jury. It was there said by Chief Justice Agnew: "But it has been often said duties arise out of circumstances. Hence, where the owner has reason to apprehend danger, owing to the peculiar situation of his property and its openness to accident, the rule will vary. The question then becomes one for a jury, to be determined upon all its facts of the probability of danger, and the grossness of the act of imputed negligence. Such was the nature of this case. This building was a factory in which several kinds of business were carried on in different stories, requiring the use of a hoisting apparatus above, and an inclined plane below, for the easy carriage of heavy articles, machinery, etc., into and out of the factory. These appliances were approached by means of a private opening or cartway shut in by a gate, which their use required to be often opened for the ingress of wagons and hands engaged in the business. The gate and passageway opened out upon a public and much frequented street, where persons were passing and children playing. Unlike an ordinary private alley, this passage was often open, and therefore liable to the incursions of children, and even grown persons, from thoughtlessness, accident, or curiosity. Now, the inclined way which did the injury was a dangerous trap. It was a heavy platform, weighing eight or nine hundred pounds, attached by hinges within eighteen or twenty inches of the wall, and when lowered it fell across the cartway. When not lowered, it stood upright against the wall, leaning so little beyond the center of gravity that a jar or a slight pull would cause it to fall forward. Its fall in this instance caught four children beneath it. One had his back broken, another his hands mashed, and two escaped under the cavity. It was held up by no hook or other fastening, but merely rested by its own slight weight beyond the equipoise,—ready, therefore, to catch children, like mice, beneath a deadfall. When wagons passed, it was often held up by hand, and a witness saw it fall against the wheels. Now, can it be righteously said that the owner of such a dangerous trap, held by no fastening, so liable to drop, so near a public thoroughfare, so often open and exposed to the entries of persons on business, by accident, or from curiosity, owes no duty to those who will be probably there? The common feeling of mankind, as well as the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, must say this cannot be true; that this spot is not so private and secluded as that a man may keep dangerous pits or deadfalls there without a breach of duty to society. On the contrary, the mind, impelled by the instincts of the heart, sees at once that in such a place, and under these circumstances, he had good reason to expect that one day or other some one, probably a thoughtless boy in the buoyancy of play, would be led there, and injury would follow,—especially, too, when prompted by knowledge that a fastening was needed.” In Schilling v. Abernethy, 112 Pa. 437, 56 Am. Rep. 320, 3 Atl. 792, following the case just cited, it is said that circumstances may beget duties which under ordinary circumstances cannot be implied, and when such circumstances are shown to exist the question arising therefrom is not for the court, but for the jury.

Abel, the city's inspector of the sewer, and called as its witness, testifies that work had been abandoned on account of the gas; and if it be true, as testified by several witnesses called by plaintiff, that no workmen had been about the trenches for several days before Corbin's death, how can it be righteously said that the city was not derelict in its duty? On the other hand, he states that workmen were on the premises until 12 o'clock of that day; and another witness, called by the plaintiff, testifies that immediately after the death a watchman was placed at the trenches, which were filled up the next day. Abel, evidently having felt that some precaution ought to be taken by the city to guard against this danger, said that when he left the work, at 2 o'clock, about two hours before the death of Corbin, he ordered Jim January to remain at the trenches until 6 o'clock, and then light a lamp. These directions were disregarded, for no watchman was on the premises at the time of the accident. Under the facts developed on this trial, the jury should have passed upon the question of the city's negligence; and, if the learned trial judge was of the opinion that sufficient had not been submitted to sustain plaintiff's allegation that it was culpable, he was in error.

Assuming the city to have been guilty of negligence, was the conduct of Corbin such, in going to the rescue of Walker, as to prevent a recovery by the plaintiff? In other words, is she debarred from recovery because her son was guilty of contributory negligence in voluntarily incurring peril in an effort to save the life of Walker, which had been endangered by the negligence of the city? This is an interesting and most important question, but free from difficulty, in the light of reason and the thoughtful consideration it has received from many high tribunals. A rescuer—one who, from the most unselfish motives, prompted by the noblest impulses that can impel man to deeds of heroism, faces deadly peril—ought not to hear from the law words of condemnation of his bravery, because he rushed into danger to snatch from it the life of a fellow creature imperiled by the negligence of another; but he should rather listen to words of approval, unless regretfully withheld on account of the unmistakable evidence of his rashness and imprudence. This, conscience and reason approve, and the best judgment of thoughtful and intelligent judges has declared it to be the law of the land. Relying, as we safely can, upon the considerate judgment of other courts on this important question raised before them, we cannot better dispose of it than by calling attention to what they have said; adding in every case our approval of what was declared to be the reason of the law as announced.

We first call attention to Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. 43 N. Y. 503, 3 Am. Rep. 721,—fairly regarded as the leading case upon the subject,—and extend our indorsement to it, as well as to the authorities subsequently cited. We quote at length from this case, as follows: “The important question in this case arises upon the exception taken by the defendant's counsel to the denial of his motion for a nonsuit, made upon the ground that the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate contributed to the injury that caused his death. The evidence showed that the train was approaching in plain view of the deceased, and had he, for his own purposes, attempted to cross the track, or, with a view to save property, placed himself voluntarily in a position where he might have received an injury from a collision with the train, his conduct would have been grossly negligent, and no recovery could have been had for such injury. But the evidence further showed that there was a small child upon the track, who, if not rescued, must have been inevitably crushed by the rapidly approaching train. This the deceased saw, and he owed a duty of important obligation to this child, to rescue it from its extreme peril, if he could do so without incurring great danger to himself. Negligence implies some act, of commission or omission, wrongful in itself. Under the circumstances in which the deceased was placed, it was not wrongful in him to make every effort in his power to rescue the child, compatible with a reasonable regard for his own safety. It was his duty to exercise his judgment as to whether he could probably save the child without serious injury to himself. If, from the appearances, he believed that he could, it was not negligence to make an attempt so to do, although believing that possibly he might fail, and receive an injury himself. He had no time for deliberation. He must act instantly, if at all, as a moment's delay would have been fatal to the child. The law has so high a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under such circumstances as to constitute rashness in the judgment of prudent persons. For a person engaged in his ordinary affairs, or in a mere protection of property, knowingly and voluntarily to place himself in a position where he is liable to receive a serious injury, is negligence, which will preclude a recovery for an injury so received; but, when the exposure is for the purpose of saving life, it is not wrongful, and therefore not negligent, unless such as to be regarded either rash or reckless. The jury were warranted in finding the deceased free from negligence under the rule as above stated. The motion for a nonsuit was therefore properly denied. That the jury were warranted in finding the defendant guilty of negligence in running the train in the manner it was running, requires no discussion."

Approving this case, the same court, in Spooner v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 22, 21 N. E. 696, held that, if the plaintiff stepped upon the track of the railroad company in the humane effort to save younger children from danger, she was not a trespasser; and the verdict in her favor for the injury she suffered in trying to save the little children was sustained.

In Gibney v. State, 137 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 365, 33 N. E. 142, plaintiff, with her husband and infant son, was crossing a bridge over the Erie canal. The son fell into the canal through an opening in the railing of the bridge, which had been left unguarded. The father plunged into the canal to rescue him, and both were drowned. Plaintiff recovered for the damages she had sustained, and, in affirming the judgment of the lower court, it was held that, while the immediate cause of the peril to which the father naturally and instinctively exposed himself was the peril of the child, the cause of the peril in both cases might be attributed to the culpable negligence of the state in leaving the bridge in a dangerous condition. In this case Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. was again approved.

It was held in Peyton v. Texas & P. R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 861, 6 So. 690, that the law has so great a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, if the effort is made with a reasonable regard for the rescuer's own safety, and, where negligence on the part of the defendant is shown, the negligence of the person in danger cannot be imputed to the rescuer.

In the case before us, under the clearly-established facts, no negligence can be imputed to Walker.

The question of the contributory negligence of a rescuer is considered in Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 506, 30 Am. Rep. 692, where it was contended on behalf of the defendant that the calls of humanity did not excuse him. It was held, however, that the question whether the plaintiff's conduct on the occasion of the injury was wanting in reasonable prudence and caution, in view of all the circumstances, was properly submitted to the jury as a question peculiarly for them to decide. "They were to consider all the circumstances, and, among other things, that the life of a fellow creature was in extreme danger; but they must have understood that reasonable prudence and caution were elements in the case which plaintiff must prove. . . . The emergency was sudden, allowing but little time for deliberation. Some allowance might well be made for the confusion of the moment. . . . The law does not require cowardice or absolute inaction in such a state of things. Neither does it require, in such an emergency, that the plaintiff should have acted with entire self-possession, or that he should have taken the wisest and most prudent course, with a view to his own self-preservation, that could have been taken. He certainly may take some risk upon himself, short of mere rashness and recklessness."

In Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 560, 53 Am. Rep. 594, it was ruled that the negligence of the company as to the person in danger was to be imputed to the company, with respect to him who attempted the rescue. It is not negligence, per se, for one to voluntarily risk his own safety or life in attempting to rescue another from impending danger. The question whether one so acting should be charged with contributory negligence, in an action brought by him to recover damages for injuries received in attempting the rescue, is one of mixed law and fact, and should be submitted to the jury, upon the evidence, with proper instructions from the court. While one who rashly and unnecessarily exposes himself to danger cannot recover damages for injuries thus brought on himself, yet, where another is in great and imminent danger, he who attempts a rescue may be warranted by surrounding circumstances in exposing his limbs or life to a very high degree of danger. In such case he should not be charged with the consequences of errors of judgment resulting from the excitement and confusion of the moment; and if he did not act rashly, and unnecessarily expose himself to danger, and is injured, the injury should be attributed to the party that negligently or wrongfully exposed to danger the person who required assistance. Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 28 N. E. 172. The late and well-considered case of Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 88 Md. 482, 42 L. R. A. 842, 42 Atl. 60, sustains the views expressed in the foregoing authorities; and by their "aid" it was again ruled that one who voluntarily incurs peril, caused by the negligence of another, in order to save the life of one imperiled by the same negligence, is not debarred from recovery upon the ground of his own contributory negligence. Recognizing the manifest correctness of the views expressed in the foregoing and other cases, the best text writers have properly adopted them as the law for guidance of courts and juries. When one risks his life, or places himself in a position of great danger, in an effort to save the life of another, or to protect another who is exposed to a sudden peril or in danger of great bodily harm, such exposure and risk for such a purpose are not negligent. The law has so high a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under such circumstances as to constitute rashness, in the judgment of prudent persons. Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 15. One who imperils his own life for the sake of rescuing another from imminent danger is not chargeable, as a matter of law, with contributory negligence; and, if the life of the rescued person was endangered by the defendant's negligence, the rescuer may recover for the injuries which he suffered from the defendant in consequence of his intervention. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 85.

In view of what we have said, and in the light of the authorities approvingly cited, this case was improperly disposed of by the court below, and must be sent back for another trial, that a jury may pass upon the question of the city's negligence, and determine whether Corbin, under the circumstances, acted with a due regard for his own safety, or so rashly and imprudently that his surviving mother cannot recover for the loss she has suffered. In passing upon this latter question, it will be remembered, on the one hand, that, looking down and seeing the prostrate and motionless form of Walker, he may have been sufficiently warned not to descend into the danger, and his conduct may have been so rash and imprudent that, in the judgment of a jury, there ought not to be a recovery. On the other, it will not be forgotten that he had no time for deliberation, and was bound to act, if at all, instantly, as a moment's delay might have made his going down too late. And it will be still further remembered that, shortly before the day of his death, others had gone down into the trenches and returned unharmed; that the very boy whom he would have saved came back unaided from the bottom of the hole; and that those who went down for him came up uninjured. What the verdict of the jury should be, it is not for us to say, and we do not pretend to intimate. Our duty is simply to direct that, intelligently instructed, they pass upon the questions involved. Theirs will be to render a just finding.

It is finally contended on behalf of the city that it is not liable, because the alleged negligence was that of an independent contractor. As to this defense, it need only be said that, under the evidence offered by the city itself, it is without merit.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

Mitchell, J., dissenting:

I cannot see that the city was guilty of any negligence that contributed to the accident. It had obstructions around the ditch sufficient to indicate that the place was dangerous. If one had fallen in at night, the obstructions might be held insufficient; and it may even be admitted, so far as this case is concerned, that if one going down in daytime, with only the apparent risk of the descent before him, had ignorantly encountered the gas, he might have had an action for negligence in failing to warn him of the concealed danger. But any such negligence is wholly irrelevant to this case. Corbin saw the danger from the condition of the boy Walker, went into it knowingly, and would not have been deterred by a warning placard, however specific. There is, therefore, in my view, only one question in the case, and that is whether the circumstances exonerated Corbin from the ordinary legal consequences of his act. I cannot see how the goodness or humanity of his motives can either exempt him, or transfer the risk he ran to the city. It is a clear case for the application of the principle, Volenti non fit injuria. If a known danger is encountered in the performance of a specific duty, as in the case of risks taken by a fireman or a policeman, a different question is presented; but there was nothing of this kind here, for Corbin was a pure volunteer. I have read the opinions cited by my brother Brown with close attention, to discover from them some recognized principle of law to sustain the results arrived at. But I find nothing beyond an emotional basis of admiration for heroism, very creditable to human nature, but having no proper place in the administration of justice. I would therefore affirm this judgment, both on the absence of any negligence by the city which contributed to the accident, and on the voluntary character of Corbin's assumption of a known risk.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

John K. HAYWARD, Receiver, etc., of East Tennessee Land Company,

v.

v.

John HOPEWELL, Jr.

(.....Mass.....).

1. It is a fraud for promoters to undertake to decide for the future stockholders in the corporation to be organized that one third of the whole capital stock is a fair remuneration for their services, to issue that amount to themselves as such remuneration, and then to invite the public to subscribe to the stock without disclosing that fact and getting the subscribers' consent to the payment of that remuneration.

2. A vote by all the stockholders of a corporation at a time when none but promoters or their nominees are stockholders, authorizing the issuance of paid-up stock to the promoters for their services, is not sufficient to validate such issuance.

3. Promoters of a corporation cannot honestly take any remuneration for their services as such, unless a full statement thereof is incorporated in the prospectus, or unless it is voted to them after all the stock has been taken by the public.

4. Return of the property is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action against promoters for secret profits in the sale of the property to the corporation in fraud of the rights of future stockholders, if the property is no longer in the condition in which it was when the corporation took it, or it did not originally belong to the promoters, but to strangers.
5. Stock taken by promoters for services, in fraud of the rights of future stockholders, may be followed by the corporation, and the shares or their proceeds recovered in the promoters' hands, or damages for their loss.
6. Expenses of organization paid by promoters may be deducted by them in accounting for stock fraudulently taken by them in payment for services as promoters.
7. The value of stock fraudulently taken by promoters for services, for which they are required to account to the corporation, is to be fixed, not as of the time of the taking, when it had no value, but at the time when, by the launching of the corporation, its value was established.
8. A receiver of an insolvent corporation cannot maintain an action in his own name for secret profits of promoters, if the claims have not been assigned to him.
9. The appointment of a receiver to "collect, take possession of, preserve, and care for" the property of an insolvent corporation does not transfer to him the title to choses in action, so that he can sue thereon in his own name.
10. That suits to recover secret profits from promoters are prosecuted by a receiver of the corporation for the exclusive benefit of part only of the creditors is immaterial, if they alone contributed to the expenses of the suit.
11. Persons for whose benefit a suit is prosecuted to recover secret profits made by promoters of a corporation, by a receiver appointed for it in another jurisdiction, need not be shown to be creditors of the corporation to maintain the jurisdiction of the court in which the suit is brought, since that is a question for the court which appointed the receiver and directed the bringing of the suit.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of questions arising in actions by the receiver of the East Tennessee Land Company to enforce the liability of defendants as stockholders for debts of that corporation. Decrees in complainant's favor.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George W. Easley, William Hepburn Russell, William Beverly Winslow, and Lewis G. Farmer, for complainant:

Persons occupying fiduciary relations cannot make profits at the expense of their cestuis que trust through contracts not disclosed by such fiduciaries.

Thomp. Corp. §§ 4024, 4027; Alger, Promoters of Corp. §§ 21-23; Parker v. Nickerson, 112 Mass. 195; Boston v. Simmons, 150 Mass. 461, 6 L. R. A. 629, 23 N. E. 210; Wardell v. Union P. R. Co. 103 U. S. 651, 26 L. ed. 509; Re Olympia [1898] 2 Ch. 153; Tyrrell v. Bank of London, 10 H. L. Cas. 48, 2 English Ruling Cases, 496, and note.

Promoters of a corporation, who, while promoting it, become its incorporators and directors, occupy a fiduciary relation toward it from the time they agree to become incorporators and directors.

Alger, Promoters of Corp. §§ 13, 14, 63, 64, 74-76; 3 Thomp. Corp. §§ 4038, 4039; 2 Cook, Corp. 4th ed. § 651; Re Olympia [1898] 2 Ch. 153; Fountain Spring Park Co. v. Roberts, 92 Wis. 345, 66 N. W. 399.

By their execution, on or about April 13, 1889, of the contract between the Syndicate of Ten and the Phoenix Land Company, known as the contract of March 25, 1889, defendants Leeson and Hopewell became promoters, and agreed to become incorporators and directors, of the East Tennessee Land Company.

Alger, Promoters of Corp. §§ 13, 14; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 415; Yale Gas Stove Co. v. Wilcox, 64 Conn. 101, 25 L. R. A. 90, 29 Atl. 303; Bosher v. Richmond & H. Land Co. 89 Va. 455, 16 S. E. 360.

By signing the application for the charter of the East Tennessee Land Company, and becoming incorporators and directors of that company, defendants Leeson and Hopewell established their fiduciary relationship to that corporation, and their obligations as fiduciaries relate back to the time they affixed their signatures to the contract of March 25, 1889, the organization of the East Tennessee Land Company being by such contract expressly provided for.

Alger, Promoters of Corp. §§ 51-53, 55, 57; Pittsburg Min. Co. v. Spooner, 74 Wis. 307, 42 N. W. 259; Shannon's Code (Tenn.) 1896, § 2056.

Defendants Leeson and Hopewell, in view of their relationship to the East Tennessee Land Company, and its organization, and their fiduciary obligations to it and to its future stockholders and creditors, were precluded from making or sharing in any profit derived from the sale of lands, contracts, and options by the Phoenix Land Company to the East Tennessee Land Company under the terms of the contract of June 11, 1889, between the two corporations, and any advance agreement between them and the Phoenix Land Company, by which the latter company was to divide its profits with them, was constructively fraudulent as between defendants and the East Tennessee Land Company.

The existence of such a contract, and the relations of the parties, being shown, the burden of proving its fairness rests upon the defendants.

Defendants Leeson and Hopewell are directly accountable in equity to the East Tennessee Land Company, or its receiver, for any sums, or the market value of any stock of the company, received by them from the secretary of the East Tennessee Land Company upon the orders of the Phoenix Land Company, constituting a part of the agreed profits of that company and the defendants under the terms of the contract of March 25, 1889, between the Phoenix Land Company and the Syndicate of Ten, of which defendants were members.

Messrs. Long & Hemenway and I. R. Clark for defendants.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two cases were heard together in the superior court, certain findings on the material facts were made, which are set forth in a report, and the questions of law arising thereon were reserved for this court.

The suits were begun by the receiver of the East Tennessee Land Company, an insolvent corporation, to recover from the defendants secret profits made by them as promoters of that company. By a confidential circular dated March 25, 1889, the Phoenix Land Company proposed to the defendants and eight other persons that they should associate themselves together as the Syndicate of Ten, to advance to the Phoenix Land Company from $15,000 to $30,000, which should be used in obtaining options on some 225,000 to 300,000 acres of land in three specified counties in the state of Tennessee. These lands were stated in the circular to be underlaid in part with iron and in part with coal, to be well wooded, to have a soil of fair agricultural value, and to have the most healthful average climate of the South, and therefore appropriate for a health resort for the South in summer and for the North in winter; that the price for which they could be obtained was about $800,000, to which should be added $100,000 for possible expenses, and that they were really worth $1,500,000, showing a profit of $600,000. It was proposed that options on these lands should be obtained in the name of the Phoenix Land Company, and when the options were obtained a thorough investigation should be made, and the opinion of an expert obtained as to their value; that the Phoenix Land Company and the Syndicate of Ten should then organize a corporation, and, through subscriptions to its capital stock made by the public and secured by means of a prospectus, the corporation would be able to, and should, buy the options at a price fixed by the two parties to the enterprise, the Phoenix Land Company, and the Syndicate of Ten, and the net profits, after paying all actual expenses incurred, should be divided between the two. The Phoenix Land Company was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Tennessee on March 15, 1889,—just ten days before the date of the circular mentioned above,—by Frederick Gates, his son, R. W. Gates, his two partners in the real-estate business at Chattanooga, A. W. Sidebottom and O. F. Jaynes, together with one Alphonso A. Hopkins, of Elmira, in the state of New York. These five men were all the incorporators, directors; or subscribers to stock in said corporation, and "it does not appear that any stock of said Phoenix Land Company was actually issued, or that it had any paid-up capital stock at any time, or that it owned any land." The defendants, together with eight other persons, accepted this proposal, and an agreement between the Syndicate of Ten and the Phoenix Land Company was completed May 6, 1889. This agreement is spoken of in the report as "Paper No. 31," and as the "Agreement of March 25, 1889," and it included a paper referred to in the report as the "Plan More in Detail." The plan laid out in this agreement was substantially carried into effect. It was departed from in this: that the parties organized the corporation, which was to purchase the options from them at an advance when they had obtained options on about one third of the lands which they proposed the company should ultimately own, in place of waiting until options on all the lands had been secured. The certificate of incorporation of the new company was issued on May 25, 1889, and its name was the East Tennessee Land Company. The purchase price of the land on which the parties had then secured options was $322,694, of which the Phoenix Land Company had paid $6,008, leaving $316,686 to be paid. On June 6 the incorporators of the Phoenix Land Company subscribed individually to shares in the East Tennessee Land Company to the amount of $250,000, par value. The members of the Syndicate of Ten also subscribed to shares to the same amount, and the Phoenix Land Company, in its corporate name, subscribed to shares to the amount of $200,000, par value. In addition, shares amounting to $10,000 were subscribed by one Mason, in whose name some of the options subsequently secured were taken. There were thirteen incorporators of the East Tennessee Land Company. Gates and one of his associates were two. Ten of the members of the Syndicate of Ten, together with the said Mason, made the thirteen. It appears that one of the original members of the Syndicate of Ten divided his interest in two, so that there were ultimately eleven members in the Syndicate of Ten; two of them having a half share each. On June 10, 1889, the first meeting of the stockholders of the East Tennessee Land Company was held, and all the incorporators and stockholders were present in person or by proxy. At this meeting it was voted that the corporation should make a contract with the Phoenix Land Company whereby, in consideration of the Phoenix Land Company's assigning all options then held or thereafter acquired by it, and of its agreeing to secure further options at the expense of the East Tennessee Land Company during the ensuing six months, the East Tennessee Land Company agreed (1) to pay all expenses of the Phoenix Land Company in procuring further options under the contract; (2) to pay all sums due as purchase money under the options assigned to it, whether then owned or thereafter acquired; and (3) to issue to the Phoenix Land Company paid-up shares in its capital stock to the amount of $700,000. This contract was executed on the next day, June 11, 1889. The stockholders also passed a resolution instructing the secretary, on this contract being executed by the Phoenix Land Company, to issue to it paid-up shares to the amount of $200,000, par value, and to issue such shares to the amount of $500,000, par value, to persons presenting orders therefor from the Phoenix Land Company, charging the same to the Phoenix Land Company. On or about July 3, 1889, Gates and his associates in the Phoenix Land Company presented orders from the Phoenix Land Company for shares to the amount of $250,000, and certificates therefor were issued to them. At the same time the defendants, with their associates in the Syndicate of Ten, presented orders for the issue to them of shares to the amount of $250,000, and certificates therefor were issued to them. The Phoenix Land Company did not originally take out certificates for the $200,000 of shares which were to be issued to it, but they were subsequently issued from time to time to persons to whom they were sold by it. In December, 1889, the East Tennessee Land Company issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation. In this prospectus it is stated, among other things, that "the capital stock of this company represents actual value, without inflation, but does not approximate the entire value of the properties on which it is based. It was the intention of the projectors and incorporators to shape this enterprise so that its stock should be as solid as that of a national bank. Over half a million dollars of its capital were subscribed before the company's organization, at par. Subscriptions for the remainder are now solicited." And no other reference was made to the fact that the $700,000 of paid-up shares in question had been subscribed for, and no statement was made as to the way in which those $700,000 of shares had been paid for and issued. "Large tracts of land were, in 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, purchased by the East Tennessee Land Company, . . . and during said years it had laid out and made streets on such lands purchased by it, erected buildings, and started manufacturing industries; so that, where there was a population of less than one hundred, and three or four poor buildings, on June 1, 1889, there was on June 1, 1893, a population of about four thousand, and several hundred buildings." "The amount of stock issued by the East Tennessee Land Company, in all, to subscribers and purchasers, was approximately $2,000,000, par value, including the $700,000 issued" under the contract of June 11. The East Tennessee Land Company also issued its mortgage bonds, dated October 1, 1890, to the amount of $1,000,000. On November 18, 1893, one Schumacher filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of the United States for the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, in behalf of himself and all other unsecured creditors of the East Tennessee Land Company, alleging that the company was insolvent, and praying that its property might be realized, and the proceeds distributed among its creditors. In this suit receivers were appointed to take possession of all the property of the corporation. The Central Trust Company of New York, the trustee named in the mortgage given to secure the bonds of the East Tennessee Land Company, filed a bill to foreclose that mortgage on March 11, 1894, the two causes were consolidated, and the receivership was extended to the consolidated cause. The consolidated cause was referred to a master. Upon the coming in of the master's report a decree was entered on February 27, 1897, establishing 49 L. R. A.

the validity of the mortgage, ascertaining the debts thereby secured and the other debts of the corporation, directing the property of the corporation to be sold, and decreeing the order of distribution of the proceeds derived therefrom. By this decree it was found that the debt of the East Tennessee Land Company at that time was as follows: (1) Mortgage debt, $1,164,836.58; (2) vendors' lien on company's land, $165,233.81; (3) secured debt, $202,409.09, and unsecured debt, $224,818.04; amounting to $1,757,297.52. and, in addition, $9,631.10 due on receiver's certificates issued to raise money to pay taxes. The report on which this case comes up from the superior court states that the gross sum realized by the sale of the property of the East Tennessee Land Company under the decree of February 27, 1897, was $125,372.50. On May 20, 1895, an order was made in the consolidated cause directing the receivers to institute certain proceedings, and, among others, the two suits now before this court. The prosecution of these suits was subsequently suspended by order of the court, but on July 1, 1897, an order was made directing the receiver to proceed with the prosecution thereof.

Stripped of the surroundings which tend to obscure its real nature, the transaction in which the defendants took part was this: Gates and his four associates, and the defendants and their nine associates, believing that a tract of some 225,000 to 300,000 acres of land in Tennessee had natural resources which could be developed at a great profit, agreed to join themselves together to secure options on the land, and then organized a corporation which was to buy the options of them at a profit. This profit, after paying all actual expenses incurred in procuring the options and organizing the corporation, was to be divided equally between Gates and his associates, operating under the name of the Phoenix Land Company, and the defendants and their associates, operating as the Syndicate of Ten. In this joint adventure Gates and his associates contributed their information as to the land, and the defendants and their associates contributed the money ($15,000 to $30,000 to be advanced for the expenses of the enterprise, until the corporation to be organized was organized and was in funds, when these advances were to be repaid by it. It was stated in the agreement providing for this joint adventure that the profit which they would secure from the corporation for the transfer of these options would be some $700,000; the cost of the lands being estimated to be $900,000, including $100,000 for expenses, and the value of the lands to the corporation being stated to be $1,500,000. If the $100,000 of expenses included in the $900,000 were repaid to them, the difference between the two (that is to say, the net profit to the promoters of the corporation) would be $700,000. It was also agreed that "at least five sixths of its net profits shall be taken by each of these two contracting parties in the stock of the new corporation." The only particulars in which the promoters departed from this plan, in carrying it into effect, were that they organized the corporation when only one third of the options contemplated had been secured, and that they then issued to themselves $700,000 of paid-up stock of the corporation, as the net profits which they were to make in the transaction. Nominally, this $700,000 of paid-up stock was issued in payment for options then owned by the Phoenix Land Company, on which it had paid $6,000, and the agreement of that company to secure further options, during a period of six months, at the expense of the new corporation. Really, this $700,000 of paid-up stock was issued to the promoters as remuneration for their services as promoters, or, as it is termed in the report of the superior court, for the net profits which it was arranged in the agreement between the Phoenix Land Company and the Syndicate of Ten should be divided equally between the two. The twenty-first finding of the superior court is explicit on this point. It is, so far as material here, as follows: "The sum named, $700,000, was not arrived at by any appraisal or attempted appraisal or valuation of any property, options, or contracts, or title bonds, etc., which the Phoenix Land Company had. . . . Said large sum was named as a consideration that it might be enough to include the 'profits' mentioned or contemplated in said paper marked 'No. 31,' and especially in clause 3 of the Plan More in Detail; and the shares received by all the said syndicate members and some others on July 3d were then really understood to be the profits or 'net profits' mentioned in the ninth clause of said paper marked 'No. 31,' and in the third and sixth clauses of the Plan More in Detail, annexed thereto, which by that agreement were to be divided between the ten syndicate members and the Phoenix Land Company; and this, also, was known to all the then stockholders of the East Tennessee Land Company, to wit, the thirteen directors of the East Tennessee Land Company and the officers of the Phoenix Land Company." The paper referred to in the report as paper marked "No. 31," and the Plan More in Detail, annexed thereto, make up the agreement between Gates and his associates and the defendants and their associates, which was finally completed on May 6, 1889.

The defendants rely in this connection upon two of the findings set forth in the report, namely: (1) That the vote authorizing the contract of June 11 was passed, "and the contract executed by which the East Tennessee Land Company agreed to pay said $700,000 for the lands, options, contracts, and title bonds of the Phoenix Land Company, with and upon the theory and belief, under advice of competent counsel practising 49 L. R. A.

in Tennessee to that effect, that it would satisfy the laws of Tennessee, both as to the payment in of the capital of said corporation, and would, by orders of the Phoenix Land Company, be a proper way and method of settling for the shares of stock which each of the defendants and others subscribed for and got." And (2) "I do not find that the defendants, or either of them, in signing the paper marked 'No. 31,' or in signing the subscription for stock on June 6th, and in becoming directors of the East Tennessee Land Company on June 10th, and in voting for the making of the contract with the Phoenix Land Company, and in taking, each, 250 shares of stock, intended any actual fraud, or intended to defraud or cheat either the corporation or the future stockholders or creditors of the East Tennessee Land Company. They did not anticipate the failure or insolvency of the company. Whatever those who originated the project expected, these defendants, when they became parties to it, believed (and, I think, not without some reason, with proper management) that it would succeed, and result in building up a prosperous town or city at Harriman." And the defendants contend that the stock issued to them was lawfully issued for interests in land and for services rendered or to be rendered; that under these findings there was no fraudulent overvaluation in the issuing of the $700,000 of shares of stock; that the issue of this stock was voted for by the defendants and others as stockholders, and that stockholders are under no fiduciary relation to anybody, and can do as they will with their own; and, moreover, that it was consented to by all the stockholders and incorporators of the East Tennessee Land Company, and consequently cannot now be made the basis of any complaint by the corporation or anybody else. But this argument omits from the case the fact that the defendants, together with their associates in the Syndicate of Ten, and Gates, with his associates in the Phoenix Land Company, were promoters of the East Tennessee Land Company, and that these suits are instituted to charge them with secret profits made by them as such promoters, and not on the ground that the stock subscribed for by them has not been paid for under the laws of Tennessee. Whether it was or was not properly issued as paid-up stock, so far as a compliance with Tennessee statutes is concerned, is not material, and we express no opinion upon that point. See McKay's Case, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 1, 6, 8. Moreover, it is not sought in these suits to charge the defendants because they voted, as stockholders, to issue the $700,000 of stock, but it is sought to charge each defendant because he, with others, was a promoter of the East Tennessee Land Company; because, as a promoter, he stood in a fiduciary relation to the future shareholders of that corporation, and by reason thereof he could not receive any remuneration for his services as a promoter of that corporation without making a full disclosure thereof, and obtaining the consent of these shareholders thereto. McKay's Case, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 1; *Bagnall v. If the fullest effect is given to the finding of the court that the defendants intended no actual fraud in taking 250 shares each, and did not intend to defraud or cheat either the corporation or the future stockholders or creditors of the East Tennessee Land Company, all that the finding means is that the defendants honestly believed that the natural resources of the lands in question were so great that shares amounting to $700,000, par value, would be a fair remuneration to be paid to them and their associates for their services as promoters. But even if they did so believe, and their belief was honest, and there was a foundation for that honest belief, they none the less were guilty of a fraud. It is a fraud for promoters to undertake to decide for the future stockholders in the corporation to be organized that one third of the whole capital stock of that corporation is a fair remuneration for their services as promoters, to issue one third of the capital stock to themselves as such remuneration, and then to invite the public to subscribe to the stock of the corporation, without disclosing that fact to the subscribers, and without getting their consent to the payment of that remuneration. The defendants say that they did disclose the fact to the East Tennessee Land Company, and that they did get the consent of the East Tennessee Land Company to the payment of this $700,000 of stock to them for their remuneration as promoters, and that is not only enough, but it is final. It is true that the vote authorizing the issue of this stock to them, as the profits which they were to have out of the organization of the company, was voted unanimously by all the incorporators of the East Tennessee Land Company, and all who were then subscribers to its capital stock; that is, by all the persons who then had any interest in that corporation. That is to say, it is true that the fact that the promoters were to receive $700,000 of paid-up capital stock as remuneration for their services was disclosed and consented to by all the persons who then had any interest in the corporation. But it is also true that at that time no person except the promoters had any interest in the corporation, barring one Mason, in whose name some of the options were subsequently taken, and who was plainly a mere nominee of the promoters, and that at that time no capital stock of the corporation had been issued to the public. Payment to promoters of remuneration for their services is not made valid by a vote passed by the corporation, when the corporation is in the sole control of the promoters, before the capital has been issued to the public. New Sombbrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 73; Erlanger v. New Sombbrero Phosphate Co. L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218; Re Olympia [1898] 2 Ch. 153; Re British Seamless Paper-Bar Co. L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 467, 471, 472. The persons to whom the promoters owe the duty which they owe by reason of their fiduciary relation are the persons who put their money into the enterprise at the invitation of the promoters; that is to say, the future stockholders. It is to the future stockholders that the promoters must make the disclosure of the remuneration which is or is to be paid to them, and it is the consent of the future stockholders that must be obtained to make that payment valid; and if the promoters undertake to make to themselves remuneration for their services as promoters without making a full disclosure of the fact to the future stockholders, their principals, and getting their consent, they are guilty of a fraud. Promoters can make the necessary disclosure of the remuneration they stipulate for, by including in the prospectus a full statement thereof. If such a statement is not made therein, they cannot honestly take any remuneration for promoters' services unless it is voted by the stockholders after all the stock has been taken by the public.

In this case it is found that "neither of the defendants personally did anything to conceal the paper marked 'No. 31,'—the agreement of March 25,—or took any part in concealing or keeping it from the knowledge of future stockholders or creditors of the corporation. I find, however, that as a fact it was kept from the knowledge of the stockholders, other than the thirteen directors aforesaid, and of future creditors, probably by the original inventors of the scheme, the officers of the Phoenix Land Company, until after the failure of the East Tennessee Land Company." That finding is conclusive of the defendants' liability, but there is a further finding which gives to the defendants' actions a more serious character, and that finding is this: "The prospectus made an exhibit to the deposition of A. A. Hopkins was issued with the consent and approval of the defendants Leeson and Hopewell, and was widely circulated among the general public." That prospectus contains the following statement: "The capital stock of this company represents actual value, without inflation, but does not approximate the entire value of the properties on which it is based. It was the intention of the projectors and incorporators to shape this enterprise so that its stock should be as solid as that of a national bank. Over half a million dollars of its capital was subscribed before the company's organization, at par. Subscriptions for the remainder are now solicited." The defendants, therefore, not only did not disclose to their principals the fact that stock to the amount of $700,000, par value, was issued to them and their associates as remuneration for promotion services, but a prospectus containing an incorrect and misleading, if not false, statement was issued with their consent and approval.

The defendants' next contention is that the action cannot be maintained until the East Tennessee Land Company tenders back to the Phoenix Land Company the lands acquired by it under the contract of June 11. But this is not a suit to recover damages from promoters for fraud in a sale of their property to the corporation organized by them as promoters. If it were, it is clear that it could be maintained without returning the lands which had been bought. If at the time when a fraud is discovered, which was perpetrated by promoters in a sale to the corporation of property owned by them, the property is no longer in the condition in which it was when the company took it, the company may, keeping the property, sue the promoters for the secret profits which it was their duty not to make without notifying the company thereof. Re Olympia [1898] 2 Ch. 153. In the case at bar the Phoenix Land Company has never been anything but a paper corporation, with five of the promoters of the East Tennessee Land Company as its incorporators, without capital stock, and without property. The lands bought by the East Tennessee Land Company were bought by that company from strangers who owned them. The suggestion that the East Tennessee Land Company must turn over to the Phoenix Land Company the lands which it bought of strangers means that the East Tennessee Land Company must turn over its lands to the promoters of the East Tennessee Land Company. The Phoenix Land Company was merely the paper corporation under whose shelter the promoters sought to obscure the real nature of their transactions. That the corporation may sue for the secret profits made by a promoter who secured a sale of lands for a third person to the corporation without returning the lands obtained by means thereof, is well settled. Emery v. Parrott, 107 Mass. 95; Lydney & W. Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 94; Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Lewis, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 396.

In case of such a fraud by promoters, the corporation is entitled to follow the shares taken by the promoters, or the proceeds thereof, in the hands of the promoters, and to recover them specifically, or to recover damages for the loss thereof. Carling's Case, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 115, 126, 127; Nant-y-glo & B. Ironworks Co. v. Grave, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 738, 747, 748; Eden v. Ridsdals Railway Lamp & Lighting Co. L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 368, 371, 372; Pearson's Case, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 336, 341; Chandler v. Bacon, 30 Fed. Rep. 538. Promoters who have wrongfully taken remuneration for their services, and have paid the promoters' expenses and the expenses of organizing the corporation, are entitled to deduct those expenses in accounting to the corporation. Bagnall v. Carlton, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 371, 400, 403, 407, 408; Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Grant, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 918, 939; Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Asso. v. Sorringour [1895] 2 Q. B. 604. In this case it appears, by the seventeenth finding, that all payments made in procuring the options after June 11, 1889, were repaid by the East Tennessee Land Company, but it does not appear that the $6,008 prepaid purchase money expended under options held by the Phoenix Land Company on June 10, 1889, has been repaid; and there may be other expenses incurred by the promoters, in the name of the Phoenix Land Company or otherwise, in organizing the company, which, if not heretofore repaid to them, should be deducted by them in accounting to the company.

The plaintiff claims that, under the twenty-fifth finding of the superior court, he is entitled to a decree against each defendant for $25,000 and interest, less his share of the expenses, which we have already dealt with. If the balance of this stock, amounting to $1,300,000, par value, had been subsequently issued for cash, at par, the plaintiff would be entitled to such a decree. Ordinarily the damages are to be assessed as of the date of the taking; yet when, as in this case, the property taken had no value at that time, because it was stock of a corporation not then launched into being, the date must be carried forward to the date when the value of the stock was fixed. See Carling's Case, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 115, 126; McKay's Case, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 1; Pearson's Case, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 336; De Ruvigne's Case, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 306; Eden v. Ridsdals Railway Lamp & Lighting Co. L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 368; Chandler v. Bacon, 30 Fed. Rep. 538. For cases in this commonwealth where the value at some date other than the date of the wrongful conversion has been taken in actions to recover damages for the wrongful conversion of personal property, see Fowle v. Ward, 113 Mass. 548, 18 Am. Rep. 534; McKim v. Hubbard, 142 Mass. 422, 8 N. E. 152. But we are of opinion that the twenty-fifth finding ought not to be acted on as a finding warranting that decree. It is not, in terms, a finding as to the market value of the stock, neither is it, in its terms, a satisfactory finding; and it was not made in the light of the principles which it is now established govern the defendant's liability. The case, therefore, must stand for a hearing as to what the net profits are for which these defendants must severally account. At that hearing the plaintiff may follow the shares or the proceeds, or recover damages, as he may elect. The defendants must account for the shares, with the dividends received by them, or the proceeds, with interest from the date when the proceeds were received by them, or for the fair market value of the stock, with interest from the date when the market value may be found to have been established, as the plaintiff may have elected to proceed; and in any event the plaintiff must repay to the defendants, or deduct from the sum due them, the defendants' share of the expenses of the formation of the corporation, paid by them, and not heretofore repaid to them.

By the frame of the bills in equity in these two cases, and from the scope of the argument made in behalf of the plaintiff, the relief which the plaintiffs seeks to recover from each defendant is limited to the 250 shares issued to him; and the plaintiff does not seek to recover the one tenth of one half of the 200 shares of stock originally subscribed for by the Phoenix Land Company, to which each defendant was entitled under the agreement between the Phoenix Land Company and the Syndicate of Ten, by providing that all profits should be divided equally between the two contracting parties, the Phoenix Land Company and the Syndicate of Ten. Nor does the plaintiff seek to recover the 50 shares received by each of the defendants, being one tenth of one half of the 100,000 shares issued to the Phoenix Land Company under the adjustment of May 6, 1890, referred to in finding 34. And, lastly, from the frame of the bills, the plaintiff seeks to charge each defendant severally, and not to charge the defendants as jointly and severally liable with the other promoters, for all secret profits received, whether received by them, or their associates. Bagnall v. Carlton, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 371, 390, 411; Bland's Case [1893] 2 Ch. 612; Emery v. Parrott, 107 Mass. 95, 103. For these reasons, we do not express any opinion on these matters, and we have limited the matters on which the case is to stand for hearing under the present bills as above stated.

The last objection made by the defendants is that the plaintiff, as receiver, cannot bring the suit in his own name, and we think that this objection is well taken. The final 49 L. R. A.

order directing the receiver to prosecute these suits is as follows: "Said John K. Hayward, receiver, be, and is hereby, directed to proceed with said causes in the courts of Massachusetts, either in his own name as receiver, or in the name of the East Tennessee Land Company, or jointly in his name as receiver and in the name of the East Tennessee Land Company, as he may be advised by counsel to be proper, and in accordance with the rules of practice in the courts in which such cases are being prosecuted." This order does not operate as an assignment to the receiver of these choses in action. Neither did the previous orders under which this receiver was acting operate as an assignment of them. The plaintiff was appointed a receiver by order dated April 20, 1897, providing that he should "possess the power and authority conferred by former orders" on the receivers. The original order appointing receivers under the general creditors' bill provided that the receiver should "collect, take possession of, preserve, and care for all of the property, real, personal, and mixed, bonds, notes, bills, drafts, and other choses in action of the defendant wherever found, as well as of the accounts, books, and papers of the defendant, and . . . hold and dispose of the same under the order of this court." There is nothing in the original order under which the bills in equity in the cases at bar were filed which in any way affects this question. The plaintiff, as receiver, by virtue of these orders has the powers usually conferred by a court of equity upon a receiver to preserve property pending litigation, and nothing more. Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States of the powers of a receiver under a similar order, said: "The utmost effect of his appointment is to put the property from that time into his custody as an officer of the court, for the benefit of the party ultimately proved to be entitled, but not to change the title or even the right of possession in the property." Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 223, 236, 34 L. ed. 341, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1013. That such a receiver cannot sue in his own name to enforce a right of action of the corporation is settled. Wilson v. Welch, 157 Mass. 77, 31 N. E. 712.

There is nothing in the objection that, by the terms of the orders of the United States circuit court for the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, these suits are now being prosecuted for the benefit of the Harriman Land Company and one Rhodes, to the exclusion of other creditors, if any, of the East Tennessee Land Company, and the further objection that it was not proved in the suits now before the court that the Harriman Land Company and Rhodes were creditors of the East Tennessee Land Company. This is a fact, and the fact came about in the following way: The receivers of the East Tennessee Land Company were originally appointed under the general creditors' bill. When a bill was filed to foreclose the mortgage of the East Tennessee Land Company, the two causes were consolidated, and the receivership was extended to the consolidated cause. The bill to foreclose was terminated by a decree directing a sale of the property, and after that decree had been carried into effect the trustee of the mortgage filed a motion asking that the receiver should be discharged, or that it (the trustee) be absolved from costs of the receivership thereafter incurred. On this motion the court entered an order directing that the costs and expenses of the receiver thereafter incurred should in no event be taxed to the plaintiff, the trustee of the mortgage, and directing that the funds theretofore realized should not be used to pay those costs and expenses. The order then recited that, as the receivership was continued to enforce claims for secret profits, which claims would inure to the benefit of the general creditors, to the exclusion of the trustee of the mortgage, who disclaimed any interest therein, the receivership should continue only if the general creditors should give security for the payment of the receiver's expenses in those suits, and that the proceeds of those suits should be divided among those creditors who gave that security. In a general creditors' bill, only those creditors who come in under the decree and contribute to the suit are entitled to the fruits of the litigation; and the order of the circuit court in this connection was, under the circumstances, the only order which it could pass. Whether the Hariman Land Company and Rhodes are creditors of the East Tennessee Land Company is a question for the United States circuit court for the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, and not for this court. McCarty's Appeal, 110 Pa. 379, 4 Atl. 925. And the decision of that court on that point could not be raised collaterally in these suits.

Upon substituting the East Tennessee Land Company as plaintiff in place of John K. Hayward, the causes are to stand for hearing as to what the net profits are which the defendants have respectively received, or as to what the damages are which the plaintiff has suffered, as the plaintiff shall elect to proceed for the property or its proceeds, on the one hand, or for damages, on the other hand.

Decree accordingly.

That a wife is living in the same house

NOTE.—As to separation of husband and wife while living in the same house, see also Fritts v. Fritts (Ill.) 14 L. R. A. 685, and note.

with her husband, and performing some of the duties of a wife, will not prevent her maintaining a suit for separate maintenance under a statute permitting such suit "when the husband fails, without just cause, to furnish suitable support for his wife," where the contingency of the parties living apart is made a separate ground for the suit.

(May 18, 1900.)

A PPEAL by respondent from an order of the Superior Court for Middlesex County directing respondent to pay to petitioner money for her separate support. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hamilton & Eaton, for appellant:

At common law a husband is liable for the support of his wife and minor children, and whoever supplies either with necessities is entitled to be repaid by the husband. The remedy of the wife is clear, and Mass. Pub. Stat. 147, § 33, does not take away the common-law remedy. If a wife needs food, clothing, or a physician, she may buy the food or clothing on her husband's credit, or call in a doctor, and the husband is liable for the amounts reasonably expended for these necessities.

Mayhew v. Thayer, 8 Gray, 172; Wood v. O'Kelley, 8 Cush. 406; Raynes v. Bennett, 114 Mass. 424.

Fraser, Husb. & W. 839, 842.

Proceedings under this statute are designed to secure the temporary support of the wife who has separated from her husband for just cause, while the marriage relation exists and the cause for separation continues.

Doole v. Doole, 144 Mass. 278, 10 N. E. 811; Barney v. Tourtellotte, 138 Mass. 106.

Mr. Francis S. Hesselstine, for appellee:

The statute gives three distinct grounds for petition by the wife against the husband. Mass. Stat. chap. 147, § 33.

This petition is brought upon the first ground. A husband and wife may live separate and apart, within the sound construction of the act, while they continue under the same roof.

Anshutz v. Anshutz, 16 N. J. Eq. 163; Stein v. Stein, 5 Colo. 55; Magrath v. Magrath, 103 Mass. 577, 4 Am. Rep. 579.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition filed in the probate court under Pub. Stat. chap. 147, § 33, alleging that the respondent fails, without just cause, to furnish suitable support for the petitioner, who is his wife, and asking that the court make an order for her support. The only question before us is whether the court has power to make such an order while the wife is living in the same house with her husband, and is performing some of the duties of a wife. The statute enumerates three classes of cases in which the court may make an order concerning the support of a wife: It may be done "when a husband fails, without just cause, to furnish suitable support for his wife, or has deserted her, or when the wife for justifiable cause is actually living apart from her husband." There would be no reason for the first class of cases if the power of the court to make an order was intended to be limited to cases in which the husband and wife are living apart from each other. In most, if not all, of the cases which have arisen hitherto, the husband and wife were living apart. Doubtless there will seldom be occasion for an order of the court in behalf of a wife who continues in enjoyment of marital relations with her husband. But to hold that a wife can have no relief so long as she continues to live with her husband, however grossly he neglects to furnish her with needed support, would be to nullify the first clause of the section referred to. The agreed facts under which the order was made show that the parties do not occupy the same room or bed; that they do not eat together, or have any conversation except such as is absolutely necessary, although she cooks the food furnished by him for both. They also show that she is in great need of clothing, medicine, and other things, which he refuses to furnish. The language of the statute indicates an intention that the courts shall have jurisdiction to order relief in such cases. In the last sentence of the opinion in Bigelow v. Bigelow, 120 Mass. 320, which holds that this statute is constitutional notwithstanding that it authorizes an order for the support of a wife and children without securing to the husband a right of trial by jury, there is a plain intimation that this is the meaning of the statute. There is also an expression of a doubt whether it "could be upheld as a regulation by the legislature of the duty of a husband to support his wife and children while living with him." The constitutionality of the law is affirmed in that case on the ground that an order for the support of a wife and children while she is living apart from her husband is within the exception stated in the 15th article of the Declaration of Rights, to the provision securing a right of trial by jury, which exception includes all "cases in which it has heretofore been otherwise used and practised." Under the provisions of law prior to the adoption of the Constitution, all cases of marriage, divorce, and alimony were heard by the governor and council, and, of course, without a trial by jury. Stat. 4 Wm. & M. (Ancient Charter, p. 243). Although at that time there was no statute like that now before us, this statute is only a new method of enforcing a right growing out of marriage, which was enforced by an order for alimony after a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, or a divorce from bed and board, or after the commencement of proceedings to obtain a divorce. The term "alimony," in its broad sense, means support to which the wife or children are entitled on account of the misconduct and neglect of the husband and father. We think that this statute, in its application to a wife in need of support from a husband who fails to perform his marital duties in the family while she is living with him, is merely an enlargement and extension of the remedies existing in cases of marriage, divorce, and alimony before the adoption of the Constitution. It therefore falls within a class of subjects which previously to the adoption of the Constitution were judicially dealt with without a trial by jury. In reference to cases of desertion by the husband which had just occurred, and cases of a wife justifiably living apart from her husband for a slight cause, although the husband's wrong would not entitle the wife immediately to a divorce or to alimony under former laws, this construction was put upon the statute in Bigelow v. Bigelow, 120 Mass. 320, and for this reason the statute was held constitutional. We think that the principle of that decision should apply as well to the present case.

UNION CENTRAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Mrs. B. F. BUXER.

(62 Ohio St. 385.)

- *1. Where a husband procures insurance on his life, payable to himself after a term of years, if he shall live so long, and, if not, then to his wife at his death, and, after paying premiums for some years, gives a premium note which has a forfeiture clause therein more onerous, as against the interests of the wife, than the forfeiture clause in the policy, such forfeiture clause in the note will not avail the insurance company as against the wife, unless she assents thereto.
2. Where a condition in a life insurance policy is to the effect that, "in case of default for nonpayment of premium after three years, and no legal surrender having been made, the insured having paid at maturity all notes given for premium, then this policy shall, without surrender, but upon payment of all outstanding premium notes, become a paid-up term policy, without change of terms or conditions," the payment of all outstanding premium notes, though given after three annual premiums had been paid, is a condition precedent to such policy becoming a paid-up term policy.

3. Where a policy of life insurance is issued and accepted upon the conditions and agreements contained therein, such conditions and agreements form the contract between the parties, and will not be varied or controlled by the subsequent course of dealing between them, in the absence of fraud or bad faith.
4. Where it is provided in a life insurance policy that the company will loan to the insured on such policy, as collateral security, certain sums of money, graded as to amount by the number of annual cash premiums paid, the insured is not entitled to such loan after he is in default in the payment of a premium or premium note, when such default works a forfeiture of the policy by its terms and conditions, unless such default is waived by the company.

I. In cases of regular life policies.

a. Generally.

The weight of authority is that the beneficiary's rights in an ordinary life policy are vested, and cannot be destroyed or affected by the insured in any other way than by allowing a lapse of the policy. But when this is done, in pursuance of a scheme on the part of the insured and the company, to avoid the rights of the beneficiary, and the company, disregarding the lapse, immediately issues a new policy based upon the surrender value of the lapsed policy, it seems that the rights of the beneficiary will not be affected. On this there is some conflict of authority. Many cases endeavor to make a distinction between ordinary life policies and certificates issued by benefit societies, saying that the rights of the beneficiary in an ordinary life policy are vested, but holding that a different rule applies to benefit certificates. Some cases, however, apply the same rules to benefit certificates as to ordinary life policies. See subhead II., In cases of benefit societies.

In Wisconsin the cases hold that the rights of the beneficiary in ordinary life policies are not vested, although the later cases recognize that the weight of authority is to a different effect.

In the following cases it was held that the beneficiary in an ordinary life policy had a vested interest which was not impaired by the acts of the insured: Waldrom v. Waldrom, 76 Ala. 285; Brockhaus v. Kemna, 10 Biss. 338, 7 Fed. Rep. 609; Timayenis v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 22 Blatchf. 405, 21 Fed. Rep. 223; Chapin v. Fellowes, 36 Conn. 132, 4 Am. ERROR to the Circuit Court for Stark County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life-insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Burket, J.:

Benjamin F. Buxer received from the plaintiff in error a life insurance policy on his own life for $1,000, payable to himself at a period in the future, to be determined by the premiums paid and accrued profits, after deducting losses, if he should then be alive, and, in case of his death before that time, the amount to be paid to his wife, the defendant in error. The premium was $38.-33, to be paid on or before the 15th day of August in every year during the term of twenty years, and the policy provided that the insurance was made upon the consideration of the payment of said premium, "and of the payment, when due, of any and all notes given for premiums, or parts of same." The policy contained the following conditions: "After three years' premiums have been paid, except in case of failure to pay at maturity a premium note, the company will, upon legal surrender of this contract while in force, and the payment of all outstanding premium notes, issue a paid-up, nonparticipating life policy for the amount named in table A, on the following page. In case of default for nonpayment of premium after three years, and no legal surrender having been made, the insured having paid at maturity all notes given for premium, then this policy shall, without surrender, but upon payment of all outstanding premium notes, become a paid-up term policy, without

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 206, 32 L. ed. 375, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 41; Watts v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 16 Blatchf. 228, Fed. But in the following cases it was held that the acts of the insured did affect the rights of the beneficiary. In some of these cases this was done by a default suffered by the insured: Whitehead v. New York L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 143, 55 Am. Rep. 787, 6 N. E. 267; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hill, 178 U. S. 347, 44 L. ed. 1097, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 19 Fed. And in State, Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., Prosecutor, v. Schaffer, 50 N. J. L. 72, 11 Atl. 154, the same was said to be the rule.

In Wisconsin the rule is established, by the cases above cited, that the insured has the power to destroy the interest of the beneficiary.

The alteration of a policy was held not to affect the rights of the original beneficiary, where a policy was issued on A's life, payable 49 L. R. A.

to B, his legal representative, in trust for C, a minor, and, at the request of A, there was added to the application, "or, in the event of the death of said trustee during the lifetime of the insured, he shall appoint a trustee to fill the place of the deceased;" and thereafter, on the death of the trustee, the insured appointed his wife as trustee in place of B, and the company substituted such trustee in the policy, and she collected the money. Butler v. State Mut. L. Assur. Co. 55 Hun, 296, 8 N. Y. Supp. 411. In this case the court said that upon the delivery of the policy the beneficiary's interest was vested and the appointment was irrevocable, and that, "as there was no reservation in the policy of the right to make a fresh appointment upon the death of the trustee named therein, Adams's power in this respect ended with the delivery of the policy to Butler."

And where a single man takes out an accident insurance policy on his life payable to his sister, he cannot, after his marriage, without the consent of his sister, substitute his wife as beneficiary. Irwin v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 16 Tex. Civ. App. 683, 39 S. W. 1097. This was on the ground that the beneficiary in a policy of insurance has a vested interest. The case does not show to what extent a change was in fact made, but shows that the insured directed the company to have the money paid to the wife, instead of to the sister, and that his father secured the policy from a trustee who had held it for the sister.

In Carpenter v. Knapp, 101 Iowa, 712, 38 L. R. A. 128, 70 N. W. 764; Holland v. Taylor, 111 Ind. 125, 12 N. E. 116; and Supreme Conclave, Royal Adelpia v. Cappella, 41 Fed. Rep. 1, it was said to be the general rule that a beneficiary under an ordinary life policy takes a vested interest therein at the moment the policy is executed and delivered, which cannot be impaired or defeated by any act of the assured or of the assured and the company, to which said beneficiary does not assent.

In Armstrong v. Warren, 83 Hun, 217, 31 N. Y. Supp. 665, it was said that in the case of an ordinary insurance policy the insured would have no right to change the beneficiary, but that N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 699, § 238, has modified this rule as to fraternal organizations.

In Yore v. Booth, 110 Cal. 238, 42 Pac. 808, it was said that a person who procures a policy upon his own life payable to his legal heirs, although he pays the premiums himself and keeps the policy in his possession, has no power to change the beneficiary where the policy or charter does not so provide. The question involved in this case was whether statements contained change of terms or conditions, except as to the payment of premiums and participation in profits, and continue in force for such time as one annual premium on this policy is contained in its reserve value according to the American 4 per cent table of mortality, at the end of which time this contract shall cease. If the insured shall die while the said term policy is in force, the amount of foreborne premiums, with interest at 6 per cent, shall be deducted from the sum insured. (1) This policy shall not be valid or binding until the first premium is paid to the company or its authorized agent, and the receipt hereto attached countersigned by the company's agent, and delivered during the lifetime of the insured; and all premiums, or notes or interest upon notes given the company for premiums, shall be paid on or before the days upon which they become due, at the company's office, in the city of Cincinnati, or to the authorized agent of the company,—he producing a receipt therefor, signed by the president, vice president, or secretary." "(6) Upon the violation of any of the foregoing conditions, this policy shall be null and void, without action on the part of the company, or notice to the insured or beneficiary; and all payments made hereon, and all accrued surplus or profits, shall be forfeited to the company, excepting as provided in the foregoing fifth paragraph." "(8) After three years from the date of this policy, it shall be incontestable for any cause, excepting the violation of the above conditions regarding the occupation of the insured, his becoming a drunkard or having delirium tremens, nonpayment of premium, or of notes given for same, or interest thereon, and misstatements as to age." The poli-

in applications to other companies, and made previous to the application to this company, were competent to show misrepresentation as to age, by the insured. See also Thomas v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 12 Wash. 500, 41 Pac. 882, subd. II. a.

In Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Burkhart, 110 Ind. 189, 10 N. E. 79, 11 N. E. 449, it was said that the essential difference between a certificate of membership in a beneficiary association and an ordinary life policy is that in the latter the rights of the beneficiary are fixed by the policy, while in the former they depend upon the certificate and the rights of the member under the constitution and by-laws.

In Marsh v. Supreme Council, A. L. of H. 149 Mass. 512, 4 L. R. A. 382, 21 N. E. 1070, it was said that in an ordinary life insurance policy made payable to a person named the rights of the beneficiary are fixed by the terms of the policy, and are vested when the policy is issued.

In Watts v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 16 Blatchf. 228, Fed. Cas. No. 17,294, it was said: "It is a general rule that, on a life policy in the ordinary form, where the money to become due upon the death of the insured is payable to a certain person named as beneficiary, the policy and money payable upon the death belong, from the time of the delivery of the policy, to the person designated to receive the money, and he alone can maintain an action upon the policy."

A policy taken by a father for the benefit of his daughter vests an interest in her, and he cannot retain possession of the policy after her death, but will be required to deliver it up to her administrator. Glanz v. Gloeckler, 10 Ill. App. 484, Affirmed in 104 Ill. 573, 44 Am. Rep. 94. In this case it was said that the fact that the father had never delivered the policy to the daughter did not affect her right.

And where a man effects an insurance on his own life, but in his daughter's name, and pays the premium himself, although he retains the policy in his own possession, it is a complete gift to his daughter, and she may recover the amount provided for by the contract. Weston v. Richardson, 47 L. T. N. S. 514. In this case the executor of the insured claimed the money. The court said: "The mere retention of the policy did not show that the beneficial interest, also, was not intended to pass to her. Thus, the gift of the policy to the daughter was a complete one, for both the legal interest and the beneficial were vested in her."

And an alteration of the certificate, reducing the number of beneficiaries, was held inoperative. Johnson v. Hall, 55 Ark. 210, 17 S. W. 49 L. R. A.

874. See subdivision II. f, Alteration of certificate, etc.

But in Gambis v. Covenant Mut. L. Ins. Co. 50 Mo. 44, where a husband took out a policy payable to his wife, and after her death he married again and procured a memorandum upon the policy that it should stand for the benefit of his second wife and others named, it was held that the interest of the first wife ceased at her death, and that the change of beneficiary was valid. In this case the court said: "The only ground upon which the policy could be sustained, when issued, is the fact that the wife had a right to look to the husband for support. It was taken out for the purpose of securing her support after his death. The premiums were paid by him, and the whole thing was instituted and carried on for this laudable purpose. This object being forever lost, was the husband bound to continue the policy for the benefit of her representatives? Could he not surrender it, or, by failing to pay further premiums, let it lapse? Or could he not, with the consent of the company, change the beneficiaries? He must be held to have had that right. It amounts to a surrender of the old policy and the issue of a new one. Every payment made after the change was in the interest of the present wife. Suppose he had refused to pay at all, where would be the plaintiff, and what could he recover? The payments upon renewal were not for his benefit, and he has no claim to that which they secured."

One upon whose life a policy has been taken out, with his consent, payable to a third person, cannot compel its cancellation on the ground that the beneficiary has no insurable interest, and is hostile to him. Goldsmith v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 17 Abb. N. C. 15. In this case the court said that if the policy was void as a wager policy there was no occasion for a judgment directing its surrender and cancellation, and if it was valid the apprehension of the plaintiff furnished no ground for the interference of a court of equity.

In some cases the power of the insured to affect the rights of the beneficiary has been determined by the mere construction of the policy; but these cases are not included in this note. Among them are the following: Carraher v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 11 N. Y. S. R. 665; John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. White, 20 R. I. 457, 40 Atl. 5; Fidelity Mut. Life Assn. v. Winn, 96 Tenn. 224, 33 S. W. 1045; State, Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., Prosecutor, v. Schaffer, 50 N. J. L. 72, 11 Atl. 154; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. O'Brien, 92 Mich. 584, 52 N. W. 1012; Nally v. Nally, 74 Ga. 669, 58 Am. Rep.

cy states that it is issued and accepted upon the conditions and agreements therein. The premiums were paid, either in cash or by note, to August 15, 1894; and a note was given for the premium which became payable August 15, 1894, at three months, which note was not paid at maturity, and was renewed so as to become due May 1, 1895, and was not paid when due or at all; and on September 30, 1895, the company notified Mr. Buxer that his policy had lapsed for nonpayment of said premium note. He negotiated with the company for a reinstatement of his policy in December, 1895, but did not succeed, and he died May 6, 1896, leaving his widow, the plaintiff in error, surviving him. The premium note which became due May 1, 1895, and for the nonpayment of which the company declared the policy lapsed, contained the following conditions:

458; Bilbro v. Jones, 102 Ga. 161, 29 S. E. 118; Knights Templar & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. v. Gravett, 49 Ill. App. 252; Tillman v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 27 App. Div. 392, 50 N. Y. Supp. 470; Baker v. Young, 47 Mo. 453; Robinson v. United States Mut. Accl. Asso. 68 Fed. Rep. 825.

Cases where it is held that the power of the insured to affect the rights of the beneficiary is controlled by a statute are also excluded from this note, such as Videan v. Westover, 29 Ont. Rep. 1.

b. Assignments.

In the absence of a power contained in a policy it is generally held that the rights of the beneficiaries are vested, and a subsequent assignment by the insured cannot be made so as to affect their interest or to defeat their right to the proceeds.

So, where a policy is taken by a husband for the benefit of his wife, and payable to the assured, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and is thereafter assigned by the assured and his wife, the wife's interest is not affected by the assignment, under N. H. Laws 1850, chap. 96, § 1, prohibiting a married woman from making a binding contract, but the assignment constitutes the assignee a trustee for the use and benefit of the wife. Stokell v. Kimball, 59 N. H. 13.

And where the policy is made payable to the assured at the end of fifteen years, or, in case of his death before that date, then to his executors and administrators for the use and benefit of his wife and of his son if they should survive him, in case of his death within fifteen years the interest of the wife and son is a vested one, and an agreement made by the assured to assign the policy will not affect their interest. But where the premiums are paid by the assured out of the funds that he has embezzled from the bank as assignee, such bank has a lien on the policy to that extent. Hubbard v. Stapp, 32 Ill. App. 541. This was a suit by a bank to compel an assignment of policies which the bank claimed the insured agreed to assign to it.

And where the policy is payable to the assured and his assigns for the benefit of his wife, and she dies leaving a husband and two children, and the husband assigns the policy as security, and the assignee pays the annual premiums until the assured dies, on the death of the wife one third of the policy passes to the husband and two thirds to the children, and the transfer of the policy only carries the husband's rights as heir of his wife. Harley v. Helst, 86 Ind. 196, 44 Am. Rep. 285. In this case it was said that the husband might have allowed the policy to lapse by nonpayment of premiums, and that, if he wished to retain to himself the control and ownership of the policy after the death of his wife, he should have so provided in the policy. This suit was a bill of interpleader by the insurance company.

An assignment as a collateral security, by a husband and wife, of a policy on his life payable to his wife and his children, only transfers the policy to the extent of the interest of the husband and wife, and does not affect the rights of the children. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Baldwin, 15 R. I. 106, 23 Atl. 105.

So, where a policy is issued on the life of a husband payable after his death to "his legal heirs," the husband cannot make a valid assignment of the policy, as the interest of the beneficiaries is vested. Gosling v. Caldwell, 1 Lea. 454, 27 Am. Rep. 774.

And where a policy for the sole use of the wife prohibits an assignment, but the assured assigns the policy, while his wife and children are living, to his sister, with the assent of the president of the company, to secure past debts and future support, and after the assignment the sister pays several premiums, the assignment is void under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 58, § 62, and the sister is only entitled to be repaid the premiums paid by her. Unity Mut. Life Assur. Asso. v. Dugan, 118 Mass. 219.

A policy of insurance payable to the wife vests in her alone the absolute ownership of it, and it cannot be assigned or transferred by her husband or any other person without her authority. Pence v. Makepeace, 65 Ind. 345.

And an assignment by a husband and wife does not affect the rights of the children, where a policy is issued on the life of the husband payable to the wife for her sole use, but, in case of her death before the decease of the assured, the insurance shall be payable to her children, where she dies leaving the insured and seven children surviving. Southern L. Ins. Co. v. Booker, 9 Heisk. 606, 24 Am. Rep. 844.

And a policy belongs, the moment it is issued, to the beneficiaries named therein, and the insured has no interest in the same. If it has been delivered to, and is held by, him, he cannot assign or transfer it for any purpose, and his assignee is not entitled to the possession of the policy as against the original beneficiaries. Allis v. Ware, 28 Minn. 166.

And a beneficiary in a policy of insurance has a vested interest upon the delivery of the policy, and a subsequent assignment by the as-band's rights as heir of his wife. Harley v. Helst, 86 Ind. 196, 44 Am. Rep. 285. In this case it was said that the husband might have allowed the policy to lapse by nonpayment of premiums, and that, if he wished to retain to himself the control and ownership of the policy after the death of his wife, he should have so provided in the policy. This suit was a bill of interpleader by the insurance company.

An assignment as a collateral security, by a husband and wife, of a policy on his life payable to his wife and his children, only transfers the policy to the extent of the interest of the husband and wife, and does not affect the rights of the children. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Baldwin, 15 R. I. 106, 23 Atl. 105.

So, where a policy is issued on the life of a husband payable after his death to "his legal heirs," the husband cannot make a valid assignment of the policy, as the interest of the beneficiaries is vested. Gosling v. Caldwell, 1 Lea. 454, 27 Am. Rep. 774.

office, in the city of Cincinnati, or to the authorized agent of the company." She further averred that "said policy of insurance contained a provision to the effect that if any premium or premiums, or premium note or notes, or interest upon notes given to the company for premiums, shall not be paid at maturity, said policy should be null and void." She averred that all premiums and premium notes had been paid, except the note which became due May 1, 1895 (being for the premium which was payable August 15, 1894); and she pleaded in excuse for the nonpayment of that note that it was the custom of the company to collect all premiums and notes through agents, who would notify the insured that his premium or note was about due, and then make demand of payment at the proper time, and give a receipt signed by the officers of the company, and that in this instance no notice was given and no demand made, and that thereby the company waived the prompt payment of the note in question. She further averred that other payments of premium and notes were received by the company after the same were due, and that thereby, and by the course of dealing, he was induced to believe that prompt payment would not be required in order to retain his policy in force. The condition in said policy as to term insurance is fully pleaded, and the benefit thereof invoked, in the petition. The answer of the company admits the allegations of facts in the petition, but denies the waiver and deductions attempted to be drawn from the course of dealing, and pleads the conditions of the policy and note above shown, and the nonpayment of said premium note, and avers that said policy lapsed for nonpayment of assured does not affect the interest of such beneficiary. City Sav. Bank v. Whittle, 63 N. H. 587, 3 Atl. 645.

And where a policy is taken out by a person for the benefit of another named as beneficiary, the title of the beneficiary is vested immediately upon the issuing of the policy, and this right cannot be affected by an assignment or surrender. Valley Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Burke (Va.) 12 Ins. L. J. 337.

Where a policy recites that it is payable to seven children of C, who are expressly declared to be the assured, and the company promises to pay the amount of said insurance to the seven named children in equal shares after the death of C, an assignment by C as collateral security for money loaned does not affect the interest of the children. Ferdon v. Canfield, 104 N. Y. 143, 10 N. E. 146.

And where a policy was taken out for the benefit of the sister of the assured, but she paid no part of the premium, and the assured was told when he took out the policy that he could change it at any time, but the beneficiary refused to consent to any change, it was held that he could not maintain a bill in equity to compel her to assign the policy to him, nor could he compel the insurance company to assent to any assignment thereof. Potter v. Spilman, 117 Mass. 322.

In Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 206, 32 L. ed. 375, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 41, it was said that a life insurance policy, and the money to become due thereunder, belong to the beneficiary, and the assured cannot transfer to any other person an interest therein.

In Harrison v. McConkey, 1 Md. Ch. 34, it was said that, after a transfer by the insured of a policy to an assignee in trust for his wife, the assignor has no more authority or control over the policy, and the assignee will be liable to the wife for the proceeds, and the administrator of the assured has no interest therein.

In Sauerbier v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 39 Ill. App. 620, the court said: "As to ordinary policies we apprehend the rule is that the beneficiary has a vested interest which is beyond the control of the party procuring the insurance." In this case the application for the policy stated that it was in favor of the wife "and my children," and the policy named the wife only as beneficiary, and the wife assigned her interest in the policy to her husband, who assigned the policy to a lodge for debt.

That a certificate cannot be assigned so as to cut off the right of the beneficiary, see subd. II., In cases of benefit societies. Block v. Valley Mut. Ins. Co. 52 Ark. 201, 12 S. W. 477; 49 L. R. A.

Basye v. Adams, 81 Ky. 368; Quinn v. Supreme Council, C. K. of A. 99 Tenn. 80, 41 S. W. 343.

But where a policy was taken out by the husband payable to a trustee for his wife, and she died intestate, and he afterwards remarried, and the trustee for value received, at the request of the insured, assigned the policy to the second wife, it was held that on the death of the husband the second wife was alone entitled to the money; that whatever interest the first wife had in the policy vested in her husband as survivor, and that the assignment vested the title in the second wife. It was further held that the right of survivorship was not affected by N. Y. Laws 1840, chap. 80, amended by Laws 1862, chap. 77, and Laws 1873, chap. 821, permitting a married woman to take insurance on the life of her husband, and permitting a surrender by a married woman. Olmsted v. Keyes, 85 N. Y. 598.

An assignment by a wife and trustee after her husband's death was held valid as against his distributees, where a settlement provided that the trustees should effect a policy on the life of the wife, pay the premium during her life, and after her death invest the proceeds and pay the interest to the husband for life if he should survive the wife, and after the death of the husband pay to such person as the wife should by will appoint, and, in default of appointment, to the person entitled by distribution. There were no children, and the wife survived her husband, and with the trustee assigned the policy to her cousin, who paid the premium during his life, and his legatee paid the premium and collected the policy. Godsal v. Webb, 2 Keen, 99, 7 L. J. Ch. N. S. 103. In this case it was said: "I think that the intention of the ultimate limitation in the clause in question, considered in connection with the rest of the deed, was only to show that the agreement was to exclude the husband from taking more than a life interest in the investment of the policy money otherwise than by the gift of the wife, and that from the nature of the clause, considered as an agreement, it was open to the husband and wife during their joint lives, and to the wife if she survived, to alter that which was intended only for their mutual benefit."

c. Allowing lapses.

In UNION CENT L. INS. CO. v. BUXER it was held that the rights of the wife, who was the beneficiary in a policy on her husband's life, were lost by his failure to pay a premium note on its maturity, under a clause in the policy which provided as follows: "After three years' said note, and that it was canceled on the books of the company in September, 1895, and the insured duly notified thereof. The answer also contains the following: "Defendant admits that said policy of insurance also contained a provision that, in case of default for nonpayment of premium after three years, no legal surrender having been made, the insured having paid at maturity all notes given for premiums, then said policy should, without surrender, upon payment of outstanding premium notes, become a paid-up term policy, and should continue in force for such time as one annual premium thereon was contained in its reserve value, according to the American 4 per cent table of mortality; that no legal surrender of said policy had been made; that no other premium note was then outstanding; and that the reserve value of said policy at said time would have been more than sufficient to continue said policy in full force until the death of said Benjamin F. Buxer, in the manner and upon the terms and conditions as in said policy provided, had the same not been forfeited for the nonpayment of said premium note." The reply denied the answer, except as admitted in the petition. A jury was waived, and the cause submitted to the court upon the pleadings and evidence. The policy and notes given for premium were introduced in evidence. There was no conflict of testimony. The facts of the case were admitted. Even the acts of indulgence as to payments of premiums and premium notes were not contested by the company. But the court regarded that testimony unimportant, and the record shows that those facts were not considered in rendering the judgment. The court of common pleas rendered premiums have been paid, except in case of failure to pay at maturity a premium note, the company will, upon legal surrender of this contract, while in force, and the payment of all outstanding premium notes, issue a paid-up, nonparticipating life policy for the amount named in table A on the following page. In case of default for nonpayment of premium after three years, and no legal surrender having been made, the insured having paid at maturity all notes given for premium, then this policy shall, without surrender, but upon payment of all outstanding premium notes, become a paid-up term policy." The policy also provided that all premium notes should be paid on or before the days they became due, and that upon the violation of any of the foregoing conditions the policy should be null and void. The plaintiff endeavored to show that there was a waiver of payment by failure to make a demand, but it was held that the payment of all outstanding premium notes was a condition precedent to the policy being continued as a paid-up term policy.

There is no question but that the insured in an ordinary life policy may defeat the rights of the beneficiary by abandoning the policy, refusing to pay the premium, and allowing a lapse and forfeiture. Where, however, the lapse is only pretended, and the rights of the insured in the original policy are preserved by the cooperation of the company, issuing a new policy, and treating the old one as valuable consideration for the new, even though the formalities of a lapse have been enacted, the cases differ, and each case stands on the particular facts proved. A pretended lapse which is not true in fact will not usually defeat the rights of the beneficiary.

See, further, subhead I. d, Procuring new policy.

An abandonment of a life insurance contract by the insured after default in the payment of premiums, together with a refusal by the beneficiaries to keep the policy in life, will be held conclusive against any claim on the policy. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hill, 178 U. S. 347, 44 L. ed. 1097, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914.

And a daughter had no vested rights in a policy taken out by her father for the sole use of his wife and heirs, naming the wife, where his wife died and he subsequently remarried, and then, by an arrangement with the company, forfeited the policy by non-payment of premium, and obtained another policy—same amount and same premium—for the sole and separate use and benefit of himself. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 19 Fed. Rep. 671. In this case the court said that the facts showed that he retained possession of the policy; that he alone should have paid the premium, and that he failed to pay the premium, and by the terms of the policy it lapsed and became void, and that he subsequently obtained the second policy; that, as the daughter could not compel her father to pay the premium, he was under no legal obligations to her to do so; that he could revoke that gift, and direct that the money secured by this policy should go elsewhere.

And where a husband procures a policy for the benefit of his wife, or, in case of her death, for their children, and surrenders the policy after a lapse and forfeiture on nonpayment of premium, the beneficiaries cannot repudiate the surrender and at the same time claim a benefit under it as a revival of the forfeited policy. Whitehead v. New York L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 143, 55 Am. Rep. 787, 6 N. E. 287. In this case the policy was forfeited five months before the surrender for nonpayment of premium, and it was held that the payment by the company for a surrender did not revive the policy, as it was not shown that the surrender value was paid.

In Garner v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 266, 1 L. R. A. 256, 18 N. E. 130, the case of Whitehead v. New York L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 143, 55 Am. Rep. 787, 6 N. E. 287, was distinguished, as the issue of the new policy in the former case in continuation of the old one, and in preservation of all its essential rights, distinguishes the case so far as the question of waiver is concerned, for in the Whitehead case no new policy was issued at all, and the gratuity paid to obtain possession of the lapsed policy was inconsistent with a constant and continued assertion of its validity.

The failure of a wife, who was the beneficiary in a policy on her husband's life, to elect to take a paid-up policy within ninety days after default of premium, was held to prevent her from recovering against the insurance company which had canceled the policy and paid to the husband its surrender value in consequence of the husband's fraudulent representation that his wife was dead. Knapp v. Homeopathic Mut. L. Ins. Co. 117 U. S. 411, 29 L. ed. 960, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 807. In this case the court said that the surrender was not relied on by the company, and there was nothing in the case to show that it in any way influenced the wife's conduct, or preventing her from paying the premium or making the election required by the policy.

And where a policy was taken out by a husband upon his life for the benefit of his wife, containing a clause of forfeiture for nonpayment of premium, a surrender by the husband judgment in favor of the plaintiff below, and the circuit court affirmed the judgment. Thereupon the insurance company filed its petition in error in this court, seeking to reverse the judgments below.

Messrs. Ramsey, Maxwell, & Ramsey and Day, Lynch, & Day for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. R. W. McCaughey and Thayer, Webber, & Turner for defendant in error.

Burket, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As this policy was made payable to the husband at maturity, if then alive, and to his wife at his death, if he died before its maturity, it was to the interest of both to keep the policy in force by the payment of the annual premiums, either in cash or by pre-on the forged request of the beneficiary, and a forged indorsement of the check given by the company to the husband, payable to him and his wife for the surrender value, made the surrender void, but the beneficiary could not claim that the surrender was void, and at the same time claim to be relieved from the payment of the premiums; and the failure to pay the same prevented a recovery upon the policy. Schneider v. United States L. Ins. Co. 123 N. Y. 109, 25 N. E. 321, Reversing 52 Hun, 130, 4 N. Y. Supp. 797. In this case the court said that the fraudulent surrender of the policy by the husband before the April premium became due in no way excused the failure to pay the premium, unless the company was in some way connected with that fraud, or guilty of some negligent act in regard thereto. The court further said that "in those cases where a recovery has been permitted by the beneficiary, notwithstanding a surrender and release such as appears in this case, the party seeking to recover was able in some way to connect the company with the fraud, or to show some fault or negligent act on its part that excused the payment of the premium." (Whitehead v. New York L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 143, 55 Am. Rep. 787, 6 N. E. 287; Frank v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 266, 55 Am. Rep. 807, 6 N. E. 667; Knapp v. Homeopathic Mut. L. Ins. Co. 117 U. S. 411, 29 L. ed. 960, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 807.)

Where a widow brought an action against a life insurance company, alleging that her deceased husband had obtained a policy on his life and after marriage assigned it to her, and that he and the company, conspiring to defraud her, allowed it to lapse with the intent of canceling the same and obtaining another for his own use; that the premium was not paid on the day it was payable and the policy was surrendered and canceled, and afterwards the premium was paid and a new policy issued differing from the original policy,—it was held that no cause of action was stated. Britton v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 12 Daly, 164. In this case the court said that the assignment of the policy to his wife did not obligate him to keep it alive by the payment of the annual premium, and if she failed to continue the policy by paying the premium it was her loss; that if it had appeared that the husband prevented the wife from paying the premium it might have been different, but that after an assignment the insured was under no obligation to pay the annual premium to keep it alive. It was also said in this case: "The cases relied upon by the plaintiff are all cases where the policy was upon the husband's life for the benefit of the mium note. Payment might be made in cash or by note, as the parties should determine. As to his interest in the policy, he could give a premium note with a forfeiture clause broader and more onerous than the forfeiture clause in the policy; but, as she had a vested interest in the policy in case she survived him, he could not affect her rights by giving such a premium note without her consent. While the forfeiture clause in the premium note which became due May 1, 1895, was binding upon him, it was not binding as to her, because she had no knowledge of the same, and did not assent thereto. When he found himself unable to pay the premium in cash, it was his interest and duty, as well to himself as to his wife, to keep the policy in force by giving a premium note; and, as to himself, he could insert such terms of forfeiture in the note as he saw fit, wife and payable to her, or, under the enabling statutes, in the event of her death pending the contract, to her children, as in Wilson v. Lawrence, 8 Hun, 593, 13 Hun, 238; Barry v. Equitable L. Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 587; Eadie v. Shlmon, 26 N. Y. 9, 82 Am. Dec. 395, and where the substituted policy was enforced for the benefit of the wife, they were cases, as in Chapin v. Fellowes, 36 Conn. 132, 4 Am. Rep. 49, and Barry v. Brune, 71 N. Y. 261, where the original policy was in force, and was surrendered up and canceled upon the issuing of the new policy; and not cases like this, where the policy had run out, and the contract was at an end by the failure of the assignee to keep it alive."

But on a bill of interpleader by an insurance company it was held that where a policy was issued on a husband's life for the benefit of his wife, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and after her death the assured allowed the policy to lapse, and took a new policy payable to himself or his legal representative, the respective administrators of the first beneficiary and the assured were entitled to the money in proportion to the amount of premiums paid by their respective intestates. National L. Ins. Co. v. Haley, 78 Me. 268, 57 Am. Rep. 807, 4 Atl. 415. In this case the court said that the assured and the insurance company had no legal power by direct agreement to change the beneficiaries named in the policy, and they could not accomplish indirectly by the means resorted to, without the knowledge or consent of the heirs of the beneficiary, what they had no power to do by direct agreement.

Where a husband as beneficiary in a policy on his wife's life for five years paid the premiums, it was held that he had a vested interest, and that the beneficiary could not be changed without his consent, even where the policy had lapsed and a new policy had been issued in place of it. It was held that the new policy after the cancellation of the old one was not a new contract, but a continuation of the original contract with a change of beneficiary. Bunnell v. Shilling, 28 Ont. Rep. 336.

That an attempted withdrawal of a member cannot defeat the beneficiary's rights, see subd. II., In cases of benefit societies,—Conseleya v. Supreme Council A. L. of H. 3 App. Div. 464, 38 N. Y. Supp. 248. Contra, Davidson v. Supreme Lodge K. of P. 22 Mo. App. 263.

d. Procuring new policy.

The weight of authority is that the insured cannot affect the rights of the beneficiary by surrendering the policy for another one in favor but, as to her interest, he could not change the contract of insurance without her consent. He might put an end to the policy, by failing to pay the premium in cash or note, or by failing to pay the note at its maturity; but, so long as he kept the policy alive, the interest therein of the wife remained unchanged, unless she consented to a change. She had the right to stand upon the terms and conditions of the policy, unchanged and unaffected by any forfeiture clause in a premium note. But, while he could not thus affect her interest without her consent, she was equally bound with him by the terms and conditions of the policy; and she had no right to insist, after payment of three annual premiums, that he should refuse to give a premium note to keep the policy alive for both, but let it lapse as to himself, so that she might thereby have the benefit of a continued paid-up term policy. The insurance was primarily for his benefit, as an endowment, and only contingently for her benefit in case he should die before its maturity. In such cases he may do whatever the terms of the policy authorize, without coming in conflict with the authorities as to the inability of the insured or the company to change the vested rights of the beneficiary. He paid the second and third annual premiums by giving a note therefor in the first instance, and he had an equal right to pay the fourth premium in the same manner; but, if it contained a broader forfeiture clause than the terms of the policy, such clause would not be binding on the wife, without her consent. The forfeiture clause in the premium note in this case, however, is not broader, as to the question here involved, than the same clause in the policy. Both provide, in effect, of another beneficiary. Some cases try to make a distinction where the possession of the policy is retained by the assured, or where it is clear that the insured did not intend that the beneficiary should have a vested interest, holding that the insured may change his beneficiary in such a case. But this distinction is not recognized as a general rule.

In the cases below, the old policy was taken into consideration in issuing a new policy.

So, where a policy is taken out for the benefit of the wife, it cannot be converted into the separate property of the husband, or into a community asset, by a surrender and issuance of a new policy without the consent of the first beneficiary, and the company will be liable to the beneficiary. Putnam v. New York L. Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 739, 7 So. 602.

And where a policy is made payable on the death of the insured to his then wife if living, otherwise to his children, or if minors to their guardian, and the wife dies first, all the premiums having then been paid, and the insured marries again, and after his second marriage he surrenders the policy without any lapse and without the consent of his children, and takes a paid-up policy payable to his second wife for her benefit, such surrender is invalid, and his children by both marriages are his beneficiaries, and can recover from the company on the first policy. Ricker v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 27 Minn. 193, 38 Am. Rep. 289, 6 N. W. 771.

In this case the court said that, as the insured had no legal or equitable interest in the policy at the time of its surrender and cancellation, the act was a nullity, and could not affect the rights of his children, to whom it then belonged, and who alone could release the company from the obligations it contained.

Where a policy is taken by a husband payable to his wife, and afterwards the husband surrenders it to the company in consideration of a supposed misrepresentation, and obtains a paid-up policy for the benefit of his representatives, such surrender does not affect her interest, and a recovery may be had on the original policy. Fraternal Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Applegate, 7 Ohio St. 293. In this case the court said that there was no showing that the husband acted as agent of his wife, or that she had any knowledge of his action, or ratified it, and her consent would not be presumed.

And where a policy was taken payable to the insured in trust for his children, naming them, and was kept alive for fifteen years, and a surrender was then made by the insured four days after default in a premium, and a new policy was issued payable to his wife, and it was the same number as the canceled one, and the first premium was paid in part by a dividend earned by the prior policy, a payment by the insurance company to the widow did not affect the rights of the beneficiaries in the first-named policy, as they had a vested interest in the policy at the time of its surrender, and the company was liable to them. Garner v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 266, 1 L. R. A. 256, 18 N. E. 130. In this case the court said that the trustee could not deal with the policy in contravention of their rights, especially one fully apprised of those rights and of his possession and duty as trustee; and the fact that he kept the policy in his own possession was immaterial.

And where a policy is taken on the life of the husband in favor of the wife, and the company, at the request of the husband and without the knowledge of the wife, substitutes for such policy one in favor of the husband, the wife has a vested interest which cannot be destroyed without her consent. Plicher v. New York L. Ins. Co. 33 La. Ann. 322. In this case the court said that the pretended lapse of the policy never actually took place; that on the expiration of the time within which she could pay the annual premium the company, with indecent haste, issued what was claimed to be a new policy, but what was not, as to the wife, a new policy, but merely as to her a continuation of the original one. The court further held that the company was also liable to a bona fide assignee of the second policy by reason of estoppel.

In National L. Ins. Co. v. Pingrey, 141 Mass. 411, 6 N. E. 93, where an insurance company allowed a surrender of the policy payable to B, and issued a new one payable to C, it was held that on the death of the assured the company could not maintain a bill of interpleader to determine its liability. The court said that by issuing the two policies the plaintiff had exposed itself to both of these claims, and must meet them as best it could. In this case the court also said, under these circumstances the assured could not legally surrender the policy without his mother's consent, and her rights are not affected by such surrender.

And where a policy is taken out by a volunteer upon a husband's life for the benefit of his wife, and the policy provides that after two or more of the annual premiums are paid the policy is to be a paid-up, nonforfeitable one in the sum of $500 for each premium paid, and the volunteer retains the original policy, and after the payment of four annual premiums surrenders the policy, and subsequently obtains a paid-up policy for his own benefit on the life of the assured and payable to himself, the rights of that upon failure to pay the note given for premium, at its maturity, the policy shall be null and void. The forfeiture clause in the policy is, in effect, that, upon failure to pay the premium, all outstanding premium notes having been paid at maturity, the policy shall become a paid-up term policy, but, without the payment of such notes, the policy shall not become a paid-up term policy, but shall be null and void, without action on part of the company, or notice to the insured or beneficiary. The forfeiture clause in the premium note in question is that "said policy, including all conditions therein for surrender or continuance as a paid-up term policy, shall, without notice to any party or parties interested therein, be null and void on the failure to pay this note at maturity, with interest at 8 per cent per annum, payable annually." The failure to pay a premium note at maturity would prevent the policy from becoming a paid-up term policy, under the forfeiture clause in the policy, and the failure to pay the premium note in question at maturity made the condition as to continuance as a paid-up term policy null and void; so that the failure to pay the premium note in question prevented the policy from becoming a paid-up term policy, both under the forfeiture clause in the policy, and under the same clause in the note. The forfeiture clause in the note is, therefore, as to the question of the policy continuing as a paid-up term policy, not broader or more onerous than the same clause in the policy; failure to pay an outstanding premium note under either clause preventing its continuance as a paid-up term policy.

The plaintiff below pleaded the conditions of the policy as to forfeiture, the continu-the original beneficiary are not affected by the surrender, and the payment of the second policy does not discharge the obligation of the company to pay the widow. Timayenis v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 22 Blatchf. 405, 21 Fed. Rep. 223. In this case it was said that he might have allowed the policy to lapse, and thus have defeated the rights of the beneficiary.

And where a policy on a husband's life is payable to his wife, and after her death to her children, and the wife dies, and the husband surrenders the policy and takes a paid-up policy instead, which provides for payment to the wife if living, and if not living to the children of the person whose life is hereby assured, and the husband then remarries, and at his death leaves children of both marriages, the children named in the first policy have a vested interest which is not affected by the acts of their father. Carpenter v. Negus, 17 Misc. 172, 40 N. Y. Supp. 995. In this case the court said: "The law is well settled that where a policy such as was first issued by the company is made, the persons for whose benefit the insurance is taken out are the parties with whom the contract is made, and that they have a vested interest therein, of which they cannot be deprived without their consent. The insured is considered to be the agent of such parties in taking out the policy, and in the performance of such acts as are consistent with its terms, and which should be performed in support and promotion of their interests. Such agency, however, it has been expressly held, does not extend to any act in hostility to, or derogation of, the beneficial interest. Stillwell v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 72 N. Y. 385; Garner v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 266, 1 L. R. A. 256, 18 N. E. 130; Whitehead v. New York L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 143, 55 Am. Rep. 787, 6 N. E. 267; United States Trust Co. v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 115 N. Y. 152, 21 N. E. 1025; Walsh v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 133 N. Y. 408, 31 N. E. 228."

And where an insurance policy is obtained in favor of the fiancée of the insured, and placed in the hands of her brother for her, the subsequent surrender by the insured, and the taking of a new policy in favor of a creditor, do not affect her right where she has not consented to the same. Lemon v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 38 Conn. 294.

A surrender of a policy by a husband on his life in favor of his wife and children, in the belief that the policy has lapsed, and taking a paid-up policy, do not divest the wife and surviving child of their interest, where the surrender is made by the husband for the wife, but without her authority, and the company has notice of that fact, and a recovery on the original policy may be had against the company. Re Booth, 11 Abb. N. C. 145. In this case it was held that the policy had not lapsed. The insured informed the officers that he was not authorized to sign the surrender for his wife, and they answered that it was a matter of no consequence but a mere form, and afterwards the company obtained the surrender by the assured and his wife, but her signature was improperly acknowledged.

Where a wife takes out a policy of insurance on her husband's life, payable to the wife for her sole use, and in case of her death before her husband's to be paid to her children, and she dies before her husband, leaving children, and after her death the husband surrenders the policy and takes out another in his own name and for his own benefit, the substituted policy and its proceeds belong to the children, and not to the creditors of the husband. Chapin v. Fellowes, 36 Conn. 132, 4 Am. Rep. 49. In this case it was not claimed that the husband had any power to destroy the vested interest of the children by surrendering the policy to the company after the death of his wife, but that, as he was under no obligations to pay the premiums to prevent a forfeiture, he became liable to the children, on surrendering that policy and taking a new one for his own benefit, only for the cash value of the policy at that time, and that that was all that was equitably due.

Where the application is made in the name of the wife, and the contract is made directly with her, though the risk is on the life of the husband, the wife's right in it is vested, and no new contract or arrangement of any kind which affects the vested rights of the beneficiary can be made with the company alone by the insured, and the husband has no right to surrender the policy, and a recovery may be had on the original policy. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 156, 58 Am. Rep. 806, 5 N. E. 417. In this case the husband had applied for a surrender-value policy, but the substitution was not completed at his death. The company had failed to give the wife any notice of default, and she was kept in ignorance of the amount of premium due and time for payment.

And where a policy is taken out by a man for the benefit of his son, and the insured, with the consent of the company, surrenders the policy for a new one in his own favor, without the consent of the beneficiary, the right of the beneficiary in the first policy is vested, and he is entitled to the fund in the substituted instrument. Waltz v. Mutual Aid Soc. 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 208.

ance as a paid-up term policy, and that the premium note which became due May 1, 1895, had never been paid, and sought to excuse the nonpayment thereof by the course of lenient dealing, the failure to give notice and make demand of payment, and the refusal of the company to make a loan to the insured on his policy as collateral. The insurance company in its answer pleaded and relied upon both conditions of forfeiture in the policy and in the note, and admitted that it had failed to give notice of the maturity of the note, and failed to demand payment thereof, and refused to make a loan on the policy. There was some testimony introduced upon the trial, but it did not change the legal effect of the foregoing conceded facts in the pleadings. Those facts are controlling, and an application of the law to those facts will dispose of the case.

When it is once settled that a life policy is valid and enforceable on behalf of the beneficiary named therein, there seems to be no difficulty in determining that the interest of such beneficiary cannot be disturbed, without his consent, by the mere act of the person insured co-operating with the insurer. Packard v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 9 Mo. App. 469. This was an action by the insured against the company for premiums on failure to issue to him a paid-up policy.

But where a policy was taken out by a man payable to his sister, who died, and he surrendered the policy and took another one for the same amount payable, at his death, to his nephew, it was held that the sister had no vested interest. Bickerton v. Jaques, 28 Hun, 119. In this case the intention of the insured was held to control. The court said that the cases affecting the right of the person obtaining the policy to surrender it and receive another generally arose under a statute made for the benefit of the widow and children, but that these cases do not apply; and, further: "That he did not intend to place the insurance irrevocably beyond his own control is manifested with reasonable clearness by the fact that he always retained the possession of the policy himself, and he, and not his sister, paid all the premiums which were paid upon it. And after such payments were made, the insurance was kept up by the dividends which had been declared and credited to it under the rules and regulations of the company. In addition to these circumstances, the person to whom the first policy was made payable was the sister of Henry H. Jaques, by whom it had been obtained. She had lived with him, taking care of his household and family for many years prior to her own decease, and she was entirely dependent upon him for her support and maintenance. It is reasonably plain from these facts that his intention in procuring the policy was to provide for her after the time of his own decease, and when, by reason of that event, he would be incapable of affording her any further assistance. This was probably the sole and only intention by which he was actuated in procuring the insurance, and from that it must necessarily follow that her right to it was designed to be contingent upon her surviving him."

In Whitehead v. New York L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 143, 55 Am. Rep. 787, 6 N. E. 267, the case of Bickerton v. Jaques, 28 Hun, 119, was distinguished, in regard to delivery being necessary to vest title, as the policy in that case was taken out by Jaques, was made payable to his sister, and was not issued under the act of 1840.

Leaving the forfeiture clause in the note out of the question, it is conceded that the premium note was never paid, and is yet outstanding, and therefore, by the terms of the policy, there was never a continuance as a paid-up term policy, unless there is to be found something in the transaction which is the equivalent of payment of the note. Two things are pleaded and relied upon in that connection:

First. The policy provided that after the payment of three annual premiums the insured might borrow certain named sums from the company, graded, as to the amount, by the number of premiums paid; pledging his policy as collateral security. The petition averred that he relied upon this means of obtaining money with which to pay his premium, and that he applied for a loan about the 30th day of May, 1895, and was re-

In State, Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., Prosecutor, v. Schaffer, 50 N. J. L. 72, 11 Atl. 154. It was said: "The authorities are conflicting, but there are a number of well-considered cases which hold that where a person who has obtained an insurance upon his life for the benefit of children or others keeps the instrument himself, and alone pays the premiums, the beneficiary has no vested rights in the policy, and the insured has the right to surrender it and take out a new policy payable to other beneficiaries. In some cases the distinction is taken that where, after the policy is taken out, it is delivered to the beneficiary or to someone in trust for him, the right to it thereby becomes vested in the beneficiary. This was the condition in Fortescue v. Barnett, 3 Myl. & K. 36, 2 L. J. Ch. N. S. 98. See Garner v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 17 Abb. N. C. 7; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 19 Fed. Rep. 671; Barton v. Provident Mut. Relief Assn. 63 N. H. 535, 3 Atl. 627." See also subd. I. c.—Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 19 Fed. Rep. 671; Britton v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 12 Daly, 164; National L. Ins. Co. v. Haley, 78 Me. 268, 57 Am. Rep. 807, 4 Atl. 415; Bunnell v. Shilling, 28 Ont. Rep. 336.

That claiming that certificate is lost, and obtaining a new one, will not affect interest of first beneficiary, see subd. II., In cases of benefit societies,—Maynard v. Vanderwerker, 30 Abb. N. C. 134, 24 N. Y. Supp. 932; Supreme Council, Royal Arcanum v. Tracy, 139 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 410, Affirming 67 Ill. App. 202.

That attempted surrender and change of beneficiary divests the rights of the beneficiary in the original benefit certificate, see same subd.—Delaney v. Delaney, 175 Ill. 187, 51 N. E. 961; Johnson v. Van Epps, 110 Ill. 551; Schmidt v. Iowa K. of P. Ins. Assn. 82 Iowa, 304, 11 L. R. A. 205, 47 N. W. 1032.

e. Procuring surrender value.

It is generally held that a surrender by the insured, for the surrender value, of a regular policy, will not affect the rights of the beneficiary unless there is a lapse by nonpayment of premiums. See subd. I. c. Allowing lapse.

A policy of insurance that is made payable to the wife and children vests an interest in them, and a surrender of the policy on payment of its cash value by the assured, and receiving the share of the infant children as their guardian under a regular appointment, will render him liable to them for the amount so received. Waldrom v. Waldrom, 76 Ala. 285.

And where a mother takes a policy on her fused, and that such refusal was the cause of his failure to pay the premium note. The date of the application for a loan and the refusal are both admitted in the answer. The premium note became due May 1, 1895, and was not paid at maturity, and such nonpayment prevented the policy from becoming a paid-up term policy; and an effort thirty days thereafter to obtain a loan was not the equivalent of payment, especially when payment was never made and never tendered. When the application for a loan was made, the policy was lapsed by its own terms, and the company was then under no obligation to make the loan.

Second. The claim is made in the petition that the company did not, in its dealing with the insured, insist upon the prompt payment of premiums and premium notes, and gave no notice and made no demand of payment of this note, as is more fully shown in the statement of facts above. While such a lenient course of dealing with the insured might, under certain circumstances, entitle him to further reasonable time to make payment, it could not serve as payment itself, or the equivalent thereof. In this case there was never any payment of the premium note, and no tender of payment, and therefore the policy became null and void by its own terms, and the condition upon which it might continue as a paid-up term policy—the payment of all outstanding premium notes—was never complied with. In such a case the payment of all outstanding premium notes is a condition precedent to the policy being continued as a paid-up term policy.

The policy could not be kept alive, as a continued paid-up term policy, under the provision of the policy following: "If the life payable to her two children by name, and pays the premium, the interest of the beneficiaries is vested in the absence of any by-law or statute or contract reserving the right of the insured to change the beneficiary; and the surrender of the policy for cash by the mother and the guardian of the children entitles the children to the proceeds of the policy. Jones v. Jones, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 254.

And the interest of the beneficiary in the proceeds is vested where a policy is taken by a father for his child, and the father surrenders the policy for a paid-up policy payable to the child, and afterwards as guardian collects the amount under a family arrangement made before the surrender. Brockhaus v. Kenna, 10 Biss. 338, 7 Fed. Rep. 609.

And the rights of the beneficiary are not affected where a husband takes a policy payable to his wife, and he is induced to surrender the policy by the representation of the agent that misstatements were made in his application, and he receives back the premiums paid, and dies shortly thereafter. Stillwell v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 72 N. Y. 388. In this case it was held that the beneficiary was entitled to have the policy restored, in order to maintain an action thereon. The court said: "When this policy was taken by the husband, although he paid the premium from his own means, and even regarding it as a provision for the wife, it was irrevocable, so far as he was concerned. I think, however, that the true relation between the parties, in respect to procuring the policy, was that of principal and agent. The husband surrendered a policy of another company belonging to his wife, and applied for and received this policy for her, and in her name as her agent, and when it was delivered to him it was, in legal contemplation, in her possession. As such agent he had no power to give it up, surrender it, or rescind it without her consent."

Where a husband obtains an endowment policy on his life, and assigns the same to his wife and children, and the wife dies, and the husband, assuming to act as executor of his wife and guardian of his children, surrenders the policy for a money consideration, and the same is canceled, the rights of the children are not affected, and they are entitled to recover from the insurance company. Foley v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 138 N. Y. 333, 20 L. R. A. 620, 34 N. E. 211.

And where a husband obtains a policy payable to his wife, and, without her knowledge, exchanges it for a paid-up policy, and then surrenders the latter upon receiving a certificate for its value, the wife may, after his death, 49 L. R. A.

ratify his acts in procuring the first policy and exchanging it for a paid-up policy, and repudiate the surrender of the latter, and collect the same, notwithstanding the certificate has been paid to an assignee. People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. 15 Abb. N. C. 75, Reversing 65 How. Pr. 239. In this case it was said: "It appears that a surrender of the first policy was made within the time and as required by the terms of the policy issued, and a paid-up policy issued, to which action the claimant assents, and we think the company cannot claim that the paid-up policy was void for the want of authority on the part of the husband to make the surrender. . . . When the policy was issued it became the property of the wife; it was, as stated by the court in Eadie v. Slimmon, 26 N. Y. 9, 82 Am. Dec. 395, a provision for a state of widowhood, and could not be assigned by the wife prior to the act of 1873 (Laws 1873, chap. 821). If Mrs. Brown could not assign the policy herself, no authority could be conferred on her husband to assign or surrender it, and since his death she has not ratified or consented to his action in that respect."

Where the husband procures a policy for the benefit of his wife, or, in case of her death, for their children, the beneficiary acquires a vested right, and the husband has no right to surrender the policy in consideration of money, where the policy has not lapsed. The failure to make a demand of premium, and action by the company tending to prevent payment, preclude a forfeiture, and the company will be held liable for the full amount less the premiums due. Whitehead v. New York L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 143, 55 Am. Rep. 787, 6 N. E. 267. In this case it was said that the wife had a vested interest in the policies at the moment of their delivery to her husband, by force of N. Y. Laws 1840, chap. 80, which permitted them to be made in their existing form; that prior to that enactment it was open to question whether the wife and children had an insurable interest in the life of the husband and father.

In Walsh v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 61 Hun, 91, 15 N. Y. Supp. 697, it was said that "the case of Whitehead v. New York L. Ins. Co. 102 N. Y. 143, 55 Am. Rep. 787, 6 N. E. 267, was on a question as to the power of the husband to surrender policies of this kind. The matter of the respective rights of the wife and children was not before the court. But the court, in speaking of the policies, says: 'They created a vested interest in the wife, and also one in the children by force of the clause providing for payment to them if the wife should die before the maturity of the policy.' Now, few things insured shall die while said term policy is in force, the amount of foreborne premiums, with interest at 6 per cent shall be deducted from the sum insured." The insured did not die while the policy was in force, but long after it had lapsed. It is therefore clear, from the conceded and admitted facts, that the policy was not in force at the death of the insured, and that the plaintiff below has no cause of action against the insurance company.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for plaintiff in error.

Minshall, J., dissenting:

The policy sued on in this case was one with many features favorable to the insured and the beneficiary: (1) It insured the life of the husband, for the benefit of his wife, for the period of his natural life, in the

are more unsafe in legal discussions than to take up a sentence in an opinion, and consider it as a decision without reference to other parts of the opinion. And we only quote that sentence because a previous sentence in the same opinion has been cited to show that the wife 'had a vested interest in the policies,' and, therefore, the children could have no interest. Again, that opinion says: 'These policies, therefore, at the moment of their execution, vested in the wife and children as the assured.' So that the opinion speaks as freely of the rights of the children as vested as it does of those of the wife. There is nothing, therefore, in the opinion and in the decision in that case which determines the respective rights of the wife and of the children. Both are called vested; and as to neither was it necessary to decide what they precisely were."

And where the insured transfers a policy by deed to trustees for his wife and children in case they should outlive him, and he afterwards surrenders the policy for a valuable consideration to the company, and one of the trustees dies, the other trustee may maintain a bill to require the insured to give security to the amount of the value of the policy to secure the cestui que trust. Fortescue v. Barnett, 3 Myl. & K. 36, 2 L. J. Ch. N. S. 98.

1. Giving policy by will.

The rule seems to be that the rights of a beneficiary in an ordinary life policy cannot be affected by a change in the beneficiary by a will of the insured. As to benefit certificates there is some conflict of authority.

The assured in a life insurance policy cannot divert the fund from the beneficiary named in the policy, and make it payable to his executor. Wilmaer v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 86 Iowa, 417, 55 Am. Rep. 277, 23 N. W. 903. In this case the court said that the policy constituted a contract between the insured and the company by the terms of which the company was bound, on the payment by him of the premiums, to pay a stipulated sum to the beneficiary at his death, and the will of the insured cannot alter the contract.

And where the charter of a company provided for issuing policies upon the life of any person, expressed to be for the benefit of any woman, minor, or minors, which should inure to the benefit of such person independently of the as- 49 L. R. A.

sum of $1,000; (2) it was, from its execution, a maturing "endowment policy" in favor of the insured, in a like sum, payable at twenty years from its date, on the continued performance of its conditions; (3) after three years' premiums had been paid, and all notes for the same, it could be converted into "a paid-up, nonparticipating life policy" for an amount indicated in certain tables, upon the surrender of the policy first given. Again, at its maturity as an endowment policy, the insured, instead of receiving payment of $1,000, could apply it to the purchase of "an annual income for life of $95.58," or to the purchase of "a paid-up life policy" of $1,491, with participation in profits, on furnishing a satisfactory medical examination, or, on surrendering the policy, the company agreed that it would on August 14, 1911, pay in cash its entire reserve value and its prosured or his creditors, and a policy was issued for the sole and separate use and benefit of three children, naming them, the said sum "to the said assured, their executors, administrators, or assigns," and the assured by will devised the policy in trust for different purposes. It was held that the children named in the policy were vested upon its delivery with the entire interest. Ruppert v. Union Mut. Ins. Co. 7 Robt. 155. And where a policy was payable to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the assured for the benefit of his widow and surviving children, it was held that a will made by the insured bequeathing the policy to his wife did not affect the rights of the children, under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 58, § 62, providing that a policy of insurance on the life of any person for the benefit of any married woman shall inure to her separate use and benefit and that of her children. Gould v. Emerson, 99 Mass. 154, 96 Am. Dec. 720.

See, further, subd. II., In cases of benefit societies, for the following cases:

That a will cannot divert the fund from the beneficiary originally named in the certificate. Olmstead v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. 37 Kan. 93, 14 Pac. 449; Welsert v. Muehl, 81 Ky. 336.

That a beneficiary in a certificate may be changed by will. Supreme Conclave, Royal Adelpia v. Cappella, 41 Fed. Rep. 1; Woodruff v. Tiltman, 112 Mich. 188, 70 N. W. 420; Masonic Benev. Assn. v. Bunch, 109 Mo. 560, 19 S. W. 25.

g. Wisconsin cases.

In this state the rule was early established that the insured has the absolute right to change the beneficiary. The weight of authority has since been recognized as contrary thereto, but the courts of this state still adhere to their original views.

The insured may dispose of the insurance money by will to the exclusion of the beneficiary named in the policy, during the lifetime of such beneficiary, where a policy is taken for the benefit of the wife and children. Bretlung's Estate, 78 Wis. 33, 46 N. W. 891, 47 N. W. 17. In this case the court said: "We have already stated that, according to the established rule of this court, where one person procures a policy on his own life for the benefit of another, and pays the premiums thereon, he may dispose of the insurance money by will or otherwise to the exclusion of the beneficiary named in the policy. Now, it is said that this doctrine is op-portion of the company's profits, combined, provided the policy should not have been previously determined by lapse or death. It also contained a provision for a "paid-up term policy" in favor of the wife, in these words: "In case of default for nonpayment of premium after three years, and no legal surrender having been made, the insured having paid at maturity all notes given for premium, then this policy shall, without surrender, but upon payment of all outstanding premium notes, become a paid-up term policy, without change of terms or conditions, except as to the payment of premiums and participation in profits, and continue in force for such time as one annual premium on this policy is contained in its reserve value, according to the American 4 per cent table of mortality, at the end of which time this contract shall cease. If the insured posed to the great weight of authority, and we are urged to change our decision on the subject so as to bring it in harmony with the decisions elsewhere. In answer to this suggestion we observe that we feel bound to adhere to the rule which has been so long established in this state."

So, where one procures a policy of insurance on his own life for the benefit of another, and pays the premiums thereon, he may dispose of the policy by will or otherwise, and exclude the beneficiary named in the policy. Foster v. Gile, 50 Wis. 603, 7 N. W. 555, 8 N. W. 217. In this case it was said that this is the rule in Wisconsin, while the weight of authority in other states seems to be contrary. The prior decision of Clark v. Durand, 12 Wis. 233, and the Minnesota case of Ricker v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 27 Minn. 193, 38 Am. Rep. 289, 6 N. W. 771, were distinguished, and the court said: "But if there is any middle ground upon which the judgments in these cases may rest, and which commends itself as more reasonable and just, it ought to be adopted. We believe there is such ground, and we feel at liberty to adopt it. Notwithstanding what was said in Clark v. Durand, we think the taking of the policy by the insured, payable to another, is so far in the nature of an executed voluntary settlement that it vests in the person to whom the insurance money is made payable an actual subsisting interest in the policy, but not the absolute, unconditional ownership of it and of the moneys therein agreed to be paid. The interest of the beneficiary is subject to the right of the insured, who has paid the premiums, to revoke the same and retain it himself or vest it elsewhere. At least, he may do this with the consent of the company which issued the policy."

And a husband who survives his wife may dispose of a policy issued for her benefit, where he has paid the premium. Kerman v. Howard, 23 Wis. 108. In this case it was held that Wis. Rev. Stat. chap. 95, § 5, providing that a policy on the life of any person for the benefit of a married woman shall inure to her sole use and that of her children, if any, independently of her husband and of his creditors and representatives, enabled the husband to effect a policy of insurance on his life for the benefit of his wife. The court said: "But when the husband effects a policy on his own life for the benefit of his wife, pays the premiums, and survives her, we do not think the statute intended to deprive him of all power over the policy. Suppose he wished to change the policy in favor of some other person, could he not do it with the consent of the company? He might wish shall die while the said term policy is in force, the amount of foreborne premiums, with interest at 6 per cent, shall be deducted from the sum insured." It is on this provision in the policy that the plaintiff, the wife of the insured, asked a recovery, and on which a judgment was rendered in her favor, which was affirmed by the circuit court. It is admitted that all the conditions requisite to a paid-up term policy had on August 15, 1894, been performed,—all premiums to that time had been paid, and there were no outstanding notes; and, if nothing more had been done, she would, at the date of her husband's death, have been entitled to $1,000, less the amount of foreborne premiums, with interest at 6 per cent, as the insured died within the term of such paid-up policy. This is not disputed by counsel for the company, who has argued the case with much fairness, to use or assign the policy as a means of credit or security. He might not wish to continue the payments by which the policy was kept alive, and thus abandon the policy altogether. Would he not have the right to discontinue payment of the premiums, and let the policy lapse? It seems to us that he would, or that he might bequeath or assign the beneficial interest in the policy as he might think proper. This right to dispose of the policy he would have in the absence of the statute, and we do not think the legislature intended to deprive him of it by that provision." The court distinguished the case of Eadie v. Shimmom, 26 N. Y. 9, 82 Am. Dec. 395, as there the policy recited that the wife paid the premium for the first year, and for the like premium to be paid the company insured the life of the husband, and the assignment by the husband and wife was void on account of duress; but that case was on the ground that the insurance was effected by the wife at her expense.

The infant has not a vested interest where a father takes out a policy for the benefit of his infant child, and the father, desiring to cease paying premiums, transfers the same by delivery, with the consent of the insurance company, to a third person, who agrees to pay premiums. Clark v. Durand, 12 Wis. 233. In this case the court said that the infant was no party to the policy or agreement, and furnished no part of the consideration. "So far as he was concerned, it was a mere proposed gratuity or gift,—a voluntary thing,—which they were in no way bound to do, and which they might do or cease to do, as best suited their convenience or pleasure. He was a mere volunteer, not having any present beneficial interest, but who, it was intended at one time, should, on the happening of many contingencies, be so interested on some future occasion. He had no vested right in the policy or in the money secured by it."

II. In cases of benefit societies.

a. Generally.

There is a conflict of authority as to whether or not the insured can destroy the rights of the beneficiary under a benefit certificate, in the absence of authority under a statute, constitution, by-laws, or contract. Some cases and text-books are quite decided in expressing the opinion that the weight of authority is in favor of the right of the assured to destroy the rights of the beneficiary.

Some cases hold that the insured has the but, I think, on a mistaken construction of the terms of the policy. The claim is that this stipulation was modified by a note given for the premium due August 15, 1894 (premiums being due and payable in advance), and which note contained this provision: "Said policy, including all conditions therein for surrender or continuance as a paid-up term policy, shall, without notice to any party or parties interested therein, be null and void upon failure to pay this note at maturity, with interest at 8 per cent per annum, payable annually. In case this note is not paid at maturity, the full amount of premium shall be considered earned as premium during its currency, and the note payable without reviving the policy or any of its provisions."

It is admitted in the pleadings that the wife was no party to the note containing this provision, and that it was given without her knowledge or consent. That it materially varied the terms of the policy as to this particular feature is apparent. It in fact blotted out the provision as to a paid-up term policy. It is claimed, however, that the husband had the right to give such a note, without the assent of his wife, in the interest of himself, and for the benefit of his wife, as the policy would have been void as to everything secured by it, except the paid-up term, unless he were permitted to give a note for the premium. The argument is maintained with much plausibility, but it is not sound. Whether it would have been to the interest of the wife, or not, to surrender the advantage of a paid-up term policy for other possible advantages that might result from giving a note, is immaterial. She could not, as we shall presently see, be af-power to destroy the rights of the beneficiary in a benefit certificate, on the ground that a beneficiary in such insurance has no vested rights. Supreme Conclave, Royal Adelpia v. Cappella, 41 Fed. Rep. 1; Johnson v. Van Epps, 110 Ill. 551; Delaney v. Delaney, 175 Ill. 187, 51 N. E. 961, Affirming 70 Ill. App. 130; Milner v. Bowman, 119 Ind. 448, 21 N. E. 1094; Schmidt v. Iowa K. of P. Ins. Asso. 82 Iowa, 304, 11 L. R. A. 205, 47 N. W. 1032; Carpenter v. Knapp, 101 Iowa, 712, 38 L. R. A. 128, 70 N. W. 764; Woodruff v. Tiltman, 112 Mich. 188, 70 N. W. 420; Masonic Benev. Asso. v. Bunch, 109 Mo. 560, 19 S. W. 25; Davidson v. Supreme Lodge, K. of P. 22 Mo. App. 263; Fleeman v. Fleeman, 39 N. Y. S. R. 307, 15 N. Y. Supp. 838; Thomas v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 12 Wash. 500, 41 Pac. 882.

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Jory v. Supreme Council, I. of H. 105 Cal. 20, 26 L. R. A. 733, 38 Pac. 524; Brown v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 80 Iowa, 287, 45 N. W. 884.

In De Silva v. Supreme Council of Portuguese Union, 109 Cal. 373, 42 Pac. 32, the question was not decided.

But other cases hold that the beneficiary in a benefit certificate has a vested interest, and that the assured has no power to change the beneficiary or affect his interest by any action, on the ground that benefit certificates and policies are controlled by the same rules as policies. Johnson v. Hall, 55 Ark. 210, 17 S. W. 874; Block v. Valley Mut. Ins. Asso. 52 Ark. 201, 12 S. W. 477; Kline v. National Ben. Asso. 111 Ind. 462, 11 N. E. 620; Bayse v. Adams, 81 Ky. 368; Weisert v. Muehl, 81 Ky. 336.

And the same was said to be the rule in Love v. Clune, 24 Colo. 237, 50 Pac. 34.

Some cases so hold where the beneficiary has paid the dues and assessments. Tudor v. Tudor, 26 Ohio L. J. 368; Supreme Council, Royal Arcanum v. Tracy, 169 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 401, Affirming 67 Ill. App. 202; Conselyea v. Supreme Council, A. L. of H. 3 App. Div. 464, 38 N. Y. Supp. 248; Maynard v. Vanderwerker, 30 Abb. N. C. 134, 24 N. Y. Supp. 932.

And the same was said to be the rule in Nix v. Donovan, 46 N. Y. S. R. 21, 18 N. Y. Supp. 435.

And where the contract is held to be one between the society and beneficiary. Smith v. National Ben. Soc. 123 N. Y. 85, 9 L. R. A. 616, 25 N. E. 197, Affirming 51 Hun, 575, 4 N. Y. Supp. 521.

And some transfers by the assured were held ineffectual in Quinn v. Supreme Council, C. K. of A. 99 Tenn. 80, 41 S. W. 343; Owby v. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. 101 Tenn. 16, 46 S. W. 758.

Where a benefit certificate was issued in favor of the wife, and after death it was attempted to show that the insurance was void for misrepresentation, and the evidence was excluded upon the apparent ground that the beneficiary had acquired a vested interest which could not be defeated by the acts of the member upon whose life the benefit depended. It was held that such is the nature of the interest of a beneficiary in an ordinary policy, but as to beneficiary certificates the weight of authority has established the doctrine that the interest of the beneficiary before the death of the member is a mere expectancy which may be changed at any time by the action of the assured. Thomas v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 12 Wash. 500, 41 Pac. 882.

b. Assignments.

Where a benefit certificate payable to the assured was issued after his suspension for non-payment of assessments, in place of a certificate payable to his wife, an assignment by the assured, in pursuance of an agreement that the assignee should pay him a certain amount and the necessary dues for reinstatement, was held void as against public policy, and the beneficiary was entitled to the fund less the amount paid by the assignee. Quinn v. Supreme Council, C. K. of A. 99 Tenn. 80, 41 S. W. 343.

And where a certificate of a benefit society was made payable to the "estate" of the insured, it was held that the insured could not sell or assign the certificate so as to divert the fund from both his legal heirs and beneficiaries. Bayse v. Adams, 81 Ky. 368. In this case it was said that there was no provision in the charter, or authority given, for the sale or assignment of the policy, nor for investing the purchaser and assignee with any of the privileges as a member, or interest in the fund payable at the death of the insured.

In Block v. Valley Mut. Ins. Asso. 52 Ark. 201, 12 S. W. 477, it is held that in Arkansas there is no difference between insurance companies and benefit companies, and that, in the absence of any provision of the charter or by-laws authorizing the substitution of a beneficiary, the rights of the beneficiary cannot be cut off by an assignment.

fectured by agreements to which she was not a party, on the ground that it might be to her interest. She had the right to be consulted in the matter, and determine for herself whether she would abandon an interest that had vested in her, for some other advantage that might accrue from giving such a note. The provision contained in the note is inconsistent with the terms of the stipulation as to a paid-up term policy, and, if such stipulations may be avoided in this way, they might as well be stricken from their policies. They would be more deceptive than real. First, it will be observed that the right to such a policy only arises upon the nonpayment of premium after three years, and no surrender of the policy has been made. As it rests upon a nonpayment of premium after a certain number of premiums have been paid, a subsequent failure in this regard during the term cannot affect it,—the consideration for it being the premiums that had, without default, been paid; and any agreement which requires the subsequent payment of a premium, or a note given for it, as a condition of its existence, is derogatory to it. To say that payments are required, to preserve a paid-up policy, is a solecism in language. It cannot be a paid-up policy, so long as payments are required to keep it alive as such policy. Again, it will be observed that foreborne premiums are to be deducted from the amount of the policy. This could not be if their nonpayment works a forfeiture. In a case of forfeiture there is nothing to deduct from. It will be further observed that, on the happening of the conditions mentioned, it is to become a paid-up term policy "without change of terms or conditions, except as to payment of premiums and partici-

c. Allowing lapse or forfeiture.

An attempted withdrawal by a member to defeat the wife's rights was held ineffectual on account of her having control of the certificate, where a benefit certificate was taken for the benefit of the wife, and she paid assessments up to a certain time, after which a tender by her was refused. Conselyea v. Supreme Council, A. L. of H. 3 App. Div. 464, 38 N. Y. Supp. 248. In this case the court said that she had secured the certificate under an agreement by which she was to pay the assessments, and these she paid, with the knowledge of the society, and thereby acquired a vested interest in the certificate of which the member could not deprive her. It was further held that the husband could not deliberately make himself a member not in good standing so long as she paid or tendered.

And where a certificate in a benefit association for the mother of the insured provided that it should be incontestable, and recited that the admission fee and the advance assessments had been paid, it was held that the beneficiary obtained a vested interest which was not defeated by failure to pay an order given for the assessment and admission fee, although the order provided for the forfeiture of the rights of the member in the association if the same was not paid. Kline v. National Ben. Assn. 111 Ind. 462, 11 N. E. 620. This was on the ground that the association was estopped by the recital in the certificate. It was held that the clause of forfeiture in the order was inconsistent with the recital in the certificate. It was said in this case that the beneficiary takes an immediate interest in the policy, and her rights cannot be impaired by any act of the assured performed subsequent to the execution of the policy, for the contract is that of any ordinary insurance company, and not one of a benevolent organization.

But where a member of the endowment rank, Knights of Pythias, had a certificate payable to his daughter, and afterwards was suspended for nonpayment of assessments and applied for reinstatement and paid up all sums required, and requested a new certificate payable to his wife, it was held that the interest of the first beneficiary was not such a vested interest but that the beneficiary could be changed. Davidson v. Supreme Lodge, K. of P. 22 Mo. App. 263. In this case the court said that the application for readmission was in form the application for admission of a person who was not then a member of the endowment rank. He designated the terms on which he desired to be let in. One of these terms was that the benefit should be paid to his wife, and not to his daughter, as in the former certificate, and when the defendant accepted this application, and readmitted the applicant, it assented to these terms, and the failure to issue to him a new certificate did not affect his right.

A certificate in a benefit society payable to the wife of the assured may, after the death of the beneficiary, be surrendered, and another taken out payable to another person. Johnson v. Van Epps, 110 Ill. 551. In this case the court said: "Whatever may have been the rights of Johnson with respect to the policy before the death of his wife,—about which we express no opinion,—we have no hesitancy in holding that after that event he had the same power over it as if it had originally been made payable to himself, 'his executors and administrators,' in which case, of course, he would at any time during his life, with the consent of the company, have had the right to surrender it, and take out another making a different disposition of the proceeds, as was done in this case."

The beneficiary in a benefit certificate has no vested interest in the contract of insurance, and during the life of the member he may change the beneficiary subject to the restrictions, statutes, charter, by-laws, or certificate. The fact that the wife withheld the certificate from her husband when he demanded it does not authorize her to take advantage of her own wrong, where the society waives the surrender. Delaney v. Delaney, 175 Ill. 187, 51 N. E. 961, Affirming 70 Ill. App. 130. In this case the surrender was made by filing an affidavit that the certificate was lost, and another was then issued payable to another beneficiary. The court said: "Such right of the assured to change the beneficiary does not exist, as a general thing, in the case of an ordinary life insurance policy. The decisions in the text-books are not altogether in accord as to the reasons which exist for the distinction in this regard between certificates issued by a mutual benefit society and ordinary life insurance policies. But whether there are any good reasons for the distinction or not, it is too well established by authority to be here controverted."

In Schmidt v. Iowa K. of P. Ins. Assn. 82 Iowa, 304, 11 L. R. A. 205, 47 N. W. 1032, it is held that a beneficiary of a benefit society has no vested right in it before the death of pation in profits;" that is, it will no longer participate in profits, nor be affected by non-payment of premiums.

The policy does, however, recognize the right of the insured to give, and of the company to receive, premium notes, and provides that a failure to pay them at maturity shall render the policy void; and from this it is argued that the note, with the forfeiture clause in it as to the paid-up term policy, was authorized by the policy as issued. This policy, however, must, as any other agreement, be construed together, and such meaning given to it as will preserve all of its terms, without impairing any of them, if that can be reasonably done; and, like every instrument imposing a forfeiture, it should be construed against the forfeiture, for forfeitures are not favored in law. There is, however, no difficulty in construing the language conferring the right to give notes for premiums with the provision that, if not paid at maturity, the policy should be void, so as not to affect a paid-up term policy that had previously accrued. As already pointed out, the policy has in it many features securing interests to the insured that are separate from those of the beneficiary. Hence, in accordance with settled rules of construction, the effect of giving premium notes that are not paid at maturity must be confined to the interest of the insured in the policy, and cannot be extended to an interest in the beneficiary that has already vested, unless by the consent of the latter. Unless that be the proper construction, a paid-up term policy would be defeated, any time after it accrues, by the insured giving an ordinary note for unpaid premiums; and we should have the absurdity that, while an accrued paid-up term policy would not be affected by a non-payment of premium, the nonpayment of a simple note given for the premium would render it void. The company did not think the member on whose account it is issued, and that the member may change the beneficiary without the consent of the beneficiary, and without the assent of the association. This case does not show whether the change of the beneficiary was authorized by constitution, by-laws, or contract. The insured on his deathbed had directed a surrender of the certificate, and a request to be made for one to another beneficiary. The surrender was indorsed on the certificate, but the new one was not issued at the time of his death.

But in Supreme Council, Royal Arcanum v. Tracy, 169 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 401, affirming 67 Ill. App. 202, it is held that a member of a benefit society, who, in consideration of a cash loan from his wife, makes her the beneficiary, and delivers to her the certificate, where she pays all the assessments, cannot divest her right by making a false affidavit that the certificate has been lost and procuring a duplicate certificate for a new beneficiary. In this case it was said that "the new certificate was obtained through perjury and fraud, and, as the daughters can have no standing as innocent purchasers, they are not entitled to be protected as against appellee, who advanced her money on the faith of a contract with her husband."

And where a benefit certificate was taken out by a member for the benefit of her aunt, who was to pay the assessments thereon, and subsequently the member represented to the association that the certificate was lost, and obtained a new certificate in favor of her husband, it was held that the first-named beneficiary had a vested interest, and that her niece was powerless to deprive her of such interest by procuring a new certificate. Maynard v. Vanderwerker, 30 Abb. N. C. 134, 24 N. Y. Supp. 932. In this case it was said that N. Y. act 1883, permitting a change in the payee or beneficiary, does not prevent a contract between the member and the beneficiary by virtue of which a vested interest passes to the latter.

Where a benefit certificate was issued to a husband payable to his wife, and after her death he surrendered the certificate and had another issued payable to his niece, and thereafter surrendered this certificate and had a third issued payable to another party, and the insured was incapable of transacting any business by reason of infirmity of mind, it was held that the surrender of the second certificate did not impair the rights of the beneficiary therein. Ownby v. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. 101 Tenn. 16, 46 S. W. 758.

e. Giving certificate by will.

A beneficiary in a mutual benefit society has no vested interest in a benefit certificate until the death of the insured member. Up to this time he may change his designation of beneficiary at will, against the consent of such beneficiary, even though the latter may have advanced the money to pay the assessments upon the certificate. Supreme Conclave, Royal Adelpheia v. Cappella, 41 Fed. Rep. 1. In this case it was further said that, in making a change of beneficiary, the assured is bound to do what is required by the policy and by-laws, but there are three exceptions: First, if the society has waived a strict compliance with its own rules and has issued a new certificate; second, if it be beyond the power of the insured to comply literally with the regulations; third, if the insured has pursued the by-laws, and done all in his power to change the beneficiary, but dies before a new certificate is issued.

The holder of a certificate in a benefit society may change the beneficiary, or by will charge his beneficiary with the payment of a debt out of the insurance money, or in other words, change his beneficiary, as to a portion of the insurance, to his creditors, unless prohibited by the rules of the association. Woodruff v. Tilman, 112 Mich. 188, 70 N. W. 420. In this case it was said that the Ancient Order of United Workmen is a mutual benefit association, and certificates in these associations partake of the nature of testamentary dispositions of property, and must be construed in the same manner as bequests by will.

And the right of members of benefit societies in the sum agreed to be paid at death is simply the power to appoint the beneficiary, and the beneficiary acquires no vested interest, nor has he any property in the certificate. He has simply an expectancy which may be divested by the member by changing the beneficiary by will. Masonic Benev. Assn. v. Bunch, 109 Mo. 560, 19 S. W. 25. In this case the court said: "There is a marked distinction between an ordinary policy of life insurance and a certificate of membership in a benevolent society. In the former the beneficiary's interest is a vested right immediately upon the issuing of the policy, whereas in a benevolent society like plaintiff the beneficiary has no vested right in the certificate before the death of the member on whose account it was issued, and the member may change the beneficiary without the consent of the beneficiary."

so; else, why was a clause forfeiting the paid-up term policy inserted in the note? It was only by the unauthorized clause inserted in the note that the policy in question was to become void by nonpayment, not by any provision in the policy, or any note authorized by it to be given. A promissory note in the usual form is one thing, and a note with a forfeiture clause in it is another and different thing. It is said in the opinion of the majority that, as the premium note was not paid, therefore, by the terms of the policy, there was not a continuance of the paid-up term policy. The fallacy consists in this: The policy was a paid-up term policy at and before the note was given. It was such policy, in favor of the wife, whether another cent was paid or note given for premium for a period that included the death of her husband. The failure to pay the note, had there been no forfeiture clause in it, would not have prevented it from becoming a paid-up term policy. It had become such before the note was given. It is the very essence of a paid-up term policy that it cannot be affected by any default whatever. If the insured dies within the term, the amount is to be paid the beneficiary, after deducting foreborne premiums, and not in case premiums, or notes given therefor, are paid. As, then, the note given, and on which the company founds its defense to the action, was not within the purview of the terms of the policy, and was unauthorized by the plaintiff, she is entitled to recover.

Where a policy of insurance is taken by one for the benefit of another, it is in the nature of an executed gift, or, as said by some, is a settlement in trust for the benefit of the beneficiary; and it is settled law that, after it becomes vested, it cannot be changed or affected without the assent of the beneficiary. Bliss, Ins. § 339; Lemon v. Phoenix

But in Olmstead v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. 37 Kan. 93, 14 Pac. 449, it was held that where a benefit certificate was made payable to the assured's wife or her legal representative, and she died during his lifetime, a will made by the assured could not divert the fund from the heirs of his deceased wife. In this case the court said that the general rule of ordinary life policies is that the rights of the beneficiaries are vested when the policy is taken out, and the assured cannot change the beneficiary without his consent. It was insisted that certificates of co-operative insurance companies are not governed by the rule mentioned, but depend upon the rights of the assured under the constitution and by-laws, and the member may change the beneficiary; but it is held that, however well founded this distinction may be, a change cannot be made except with the consent of the society and in conformity with its rules and regulations. In this case no provision was made in the certificate, and the record did not show any rule of the society respecting such change.

And a certificate of insurance issued by a benefit society vests rights in the beneficiaries which cannot be divested without their consent. Welsert v. Muehl, 81 Ky. 338. In this case the insured devised the fund "to his widow," and the certificate was payable "to his heirs." The court said that there is no such difference between an ordinary life insurance company and mutual benefit associations, like the one under consideration, as would restrict the operation of the rule as to vested rights to an insurance company, and not extend and apply it to mutual benefit associations.

1. Alteration of certificate, etc.

A benefit certificate was held to constitute an ordinary life insurance policy, and it was said that the party obtaining it had no power to change the beneficiary named therein, where the articles or by-laws did not so provide, and the beneficiaries acquired a vested right of which they could not be deprived by a change of the beneficiaries. Johnson v. Hall, 55 Ark. 210, 17 S. W. 874. In this case the certificate was altered from "to her children" to "her children C., H., and E.," omitting to name one.

Where a member of a mutual benefit society, whose children were named as beneficiaries, stopped paying his assessments, separated from his family, and was divorced, and the wife paid the assessments for the children's sake, it was 49 L. R. A.

held that the member could not change the beneficiaries to his mother, and that the children were entitled to the fund. Tudor v. Tudor, 28 Ohio L. J. 368. In this case the court said that the fund was wholly the wife's creation; that had she not kept up the dues the policy would have been nonexistent years before, and that her fidelity to those unable to protect themselves had saved it, and that it could not be diverted from them or appropriated.

g. Power under constitution, by-laws, contract, or statute.

Many cases cited by the authorities turn on the question of the controlling effect of, and compliance with, the constitution, by-laws, contract, or statute, in the effort of the assured to impair the rights of the beneficiary. This distinction is not noticed in many cases that cite these cases. Cases in which the power of the assured to affect the rights of the beneficiary is controlled by the constitution, by-laws, contract, or statute, are not considered in this note, but are condensed and grouped as follows:

In some cases it is held that the power of the insured to cut off the rights of the beneficiary is controlled by the terms of the constitution of the order. Hotel-Men's Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Brown, 33 Fed. Rep. 11; Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, 18 N. E. 657; Benton v. Brotherhood of Railroad Brakemen, 146 Ill. 570, 34 N. E. 939; High Court. C. O. of F. v. Malloy, 169 Ill. 58, 48 N. E. 392, Affirming 67 Ill. App. 685; Wendt v. Iowa L. of H. 72 Iowa, 682, 34 N. W. 470; Hainer v. Iowa L. of H. 78 Iowa, 245, 43 N. W. 185; Slmcoke v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 84 Iowa, 383, 15 L. R. A. 114, 51 N. W. 8; Titsworth v. Titsworth, 40 Kan. 571, 20 Pac. 213; Eckler v. Terry, 95 Mich. 123, 54 N. W. 704; Wells v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. 126 Mo. 630, 29 S. W. 807; Knights of Honor v. Watson, 64 N. H. 517, 15 Atl. 125; Kepler v. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. 45 Hun. 274; Cullin v. Supreme Tent, K. of M. 77 Hun. 6, 28 N. Y. Supp. 276; Moan v. Normile, 37 App. Div. 614, 56 N. Y. Supp. 339; Durlan v. Central Verein of Hermann's Soehne, 7 Daly, 168; Renk v. Herrman Lodge, 2 Dem. 409; Fischer v. Fischer, 99 Tenn. 629, 42 S. W. 448.

And in other cases the same question is controlled by the constitution and by-laws. Leaf v. Leaf, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 490, 17 S. W. 354; Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447, 10 N. W. 596; Leadlay v. McGregor, 11 Manitoba, 9; Sanger v. Rothschild, 50 Hun. 157, 2 N. Y. Supp. 794;

Mut. L. Ins. Co. 38 Conn. 294; Ricker v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 27 Minn. 193, 38 Am. Rep. 289, 6 N. W. 771; Pilcher v. New York L. Ins. Co. 33 La. Ann. 322; Chapin v. Fellowcs, 36 Conn. 132, 4 Am. Rep. 49; Timayenis v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 21 Fed. Rep. 223; 2 May, Ins. § 399p; 2 Joyce, Ins. §§ 730, 1651; Pingrey v. National L. Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 382, 11 N. E. 562; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 163, 167, 58 Am. Rep. 806, 5 N. E. 417. The interest of the beneficiary is so distinct from that of the person procuring the insurance, that even the acts or declarations of the latter are not evidence against the beneficiary. Fraternal Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Applegate, 7 Ohio St. 292; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Cheever, 36 Ohio St. 201, 38 Am. Rep. 573. Hence, though the husband had the right to give a note for the premium that became due August 15, 1894, he had not the right to stipulate therein that if it was not paid at maturity the paid-up term policy should become void. This term in the note exceeded his authority, and did not, therefore, affect his wife. If it had been omitted, the effect of the nonpayment of the note would simply have affected his own interest; and, there being no authority for its insertion, the effect of the nonpayment of the note on the interest of the wife is the same as if it had been omitted. If, by the taking of a note for the premium (that is, a straight note, which he might have taken without the assent of his wife), a paid-up policy did not then accrue, it did on the nonpayment of the note; for then, in the language of the policy, "a default for nonpayment of premium" occurred. The default occurred May 1, 1895, as the note then matured, and was not paid. And whether the time of the term should be reckoned from the date of the note, or from its maturity and nonpayment, is not material, as in either case the husband died within the period of the term. I therefore concur in the first and dissent from the other propositions of the syllabus, and from the reversal of the judgment.

Sabin v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 28 N. Y. S. R. 45, 8 N. Y. Supp. 185; Jinks v. Banner Lodge, No. 484, 189 Pa. 414, 21 Atl. 4; Beatty v. Supreme Commandery U. O. of G. C. 154 Pa. 484, 25 Atl. 644; Southern Tier Masonic Relief Asso. v. Laudenbach, 5 N. Y. Supp. 901.

In some cases the charter was held to control as to the right to change the beneficiary. Raub v. Masonic Mut. Relief Asso. 3 Mackey, 68; Duval v. Goodson, 79 Ky. 224; Basye v. Adams, 81 Ky. 368; Van Bibber v. Van Bibber, 82 Ky. 347; Schillinger v. Boes, 85 Ky. 357, 3 S. W. 427; Manning v. Ancient Order of U. W. 86 Ky. 136, 5 S. Assur. Fund v. Allen*, 106 Ind. 595, 7 N. E. 317.

And the charter and certificate were held to control in Head v. Supreme Council, C. K. of A. 64 Mo. App. 212.

And the charter, by-laws, and contract were held to control the rights of the beneficiary, in Rollins v. McHatton, 16 Colo. 203, 27 Pac. 254.

Under the charter, constitution, and by-laws, the power to change the beneficiary may be authorized without disturbing any vested rights. Lamont v. Grand Lodge, I. L. of H. 31 Fed. Rep. 177; Lamont v. Hotel Men's Mut. Ben. Asso. 30 Fed. Rep. 817; Gentry v. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. 23 Fed. Rep. 718.

The rights of the beneficiary are subject to the by-laws, rules, and regulations of the society. Holland v. Taylor, 111 Ind. 121, 12 N. E. 116; Isgrigg v. Schooley, 125 Ind. 94, 25 N. Conclusion.

In conclusion, it may be said that the weight of authority seems to be that in ordinary life policies the insured has not the power to destroy the rights of the beneficiary, but that he has such power in regard to benefit certificates. Some cases try to make a distinction in this regard between ordinary life policies and certificates issued by benefit societies in cases where the terms of the constitution, charter, by-laws, or contract are not considered as controlling. The statement so frequently met with, that there is a difference between ordinary life policies and benefit certificates, must be considered in connection with the fact that in most of the benefit certificate cases cited by the courts there is some controlling feature in the certificate, constitution, or by-laws which affects that particular case. In the absence of these distinctive features there seems to be a conflict of authority as to the power of the insured to destroy the rights of the beneficiary. It may, however, be said that the insured in either case may allow a policy or certificate to lapse, and thus defeat the right of the beneficiary, and that the weight of authority is in favor of the right of the insured in a benefit certificate to change the beneficiary by will. In some cases the rights of the insured and the beneficiary are determined by the fact that the insured retained exclusive possession of the policy, and, in other cases, that the beneficiary alone paid the premiums or assessments. But these rules are not followed in all cases. The Wisconsin cases cannot be considered of much weight outside of that state, as they refuse to recognize the authorities of other states unless in accord with the view adopted in that state, which is that the insured has the right to destroy the rights of the beneficiary.

Cases involving the transfer by the beneficiary of a policy to defeat his own rights, and cases where the insured has made an assignment in bankruptcy, are not included in this note.

NATIONAL HARROW COMPANY.

(102 Fed. Rep. 714.)

Letters or notices sent out by the owner of a patent for the purpose of destroying the business of another by threatening the latter's agents and customers with suits for infringement, when this is not done in good faith to warn against infringement, but in bad faith and solely for the purpose of destroying the business of another, is a fraudulent attack upon property rights against which a court of chancery should not refuse protection.

Before Acheson and Dallas, Circuit Judges, and Bradford, District Judge.

Messrs. William C. Strawbridge and John G. Johnson, for appellant:

Where notices are given in bad faith, with no intention to sue, but simply for the purpose of injuring and destroying the business of a competitor, it is within the jurisdiction, and it is the duty, of a chancellor to interfere, if the business of the competitor is in danger of being irreparably ruined by such notices.

If property rights are invaded, an injunction will be granted, even though it enjoins against the perpetration of a crime.

There is a distinction between an attempt to enjoin the sending out of warning letters and advertisements in the matter of an alleged infringement, and an injunction against warnings made in bad faith, with the intention to destroy a business.

Dallas, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

We entirely concur in the statement of the court below that "the patent owner is justified in using all lawful means to protect his monopoly," and that "he may give notice of his rights as he understands them, and of his intention to ask the courts to enforce them in suit to be brought for the purpose." But the bill in this case, which was dismissed on demurrer (99 Fed. Rep. 160), charges the defendant with something more than the use of lawful means to protect its monopoly. It alleges, not merely that the defendant is giving notice of its rights and of its intention to enforce them, but that it "is now endeavoring to break up and destroy the harrow business of your orator, and to drive it out of the field of the manufacture of spring-tooth harrows, . . . by the circulation among the customers and agents of your orator of letters, addressed and mailed to said customers and agents, in and by which said customers and agents are falsely and maliciously informed that the harrows of your orator's manufacture, handled by said customers and agents, are infringements upon patents owned by the defendant corporation; . . . that the threats of the defendant company against the customers and agents of your orator are rendered the more effective and harmful to the business of your orator by circulars in which, by innuendo, it is conveyed to customers and agents of your orator, and contrary to the fact, as the defendant, the National Harrow Company, and its officers, well know, that your orator is not able to fulfil, by reason of lack of means, and will otherwise evade guaranties given by your orator to its customers and agents to protect them against suits for infringement 49 L. R. A.

brought by the National Harrow Company against them; that said threats of the defendant against the customers and agents of your orator are rendered still more effective by the circulation by the defendant company of notices in and by which it is falsely stated and pretended that certain patents owned by the defendant company have been adjudicated and sustained in contested cases, and injunctions issued against the defendants therein; that the defendant has continued for many years, and particularly for the past three years, the sending of the letters and circulars hereinbefore referred to, to the customers and agents of your orator, for the purpose of breaking up and destroying your orator's business in spring-tooth harrows; that the threats of suit against the customers and agents of your orator are not made in good faith, or with any intention of instituting suit against such customers or agents or against your orator."

Assuming, as on demurrer must be assumed, the truth of these allegations, we are of opinion that the court below erred in holding them insufficient to entitle the complainant to relief in equity. Where notices are given or circulars distributed in good faith to warn against infringement, no wrong whatever is committed; but where, as is here averred, they are not made or issued with such intent, but in bad faith, and solely for the purpose of destroying the business of another, a very different case is presented. In such a case property rights are fraudulently assailed, and a court of chancery, whose interposition is invoked for their protection, should not refuse to accord it. Emack v. Kane, 34 Fed. Rep. 46; Kelley v. Ypsilanti Dress-Stay Mfg. Co. 10 L. R. A. 686, 44 Fed. Rep. 23; Casey v. Cincinnati Typographical Union, No. 3, 12 L. R. A. 193, 45 Fed. Rep. 135; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 19 L. R. A. 387, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 522, 54 Fed. Rep. 730; Computing Scale Co. v. National Computing Co. 79 Fed. Rep. 962; Lewin v. Welsbach Light Co. 81 Fed. Rep. 904; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. McConnell, 82 Fed. Rep. 65; Adrianse, P. & Co. v. National Harrow Co. 98 Fed. Rep. 118; Re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 39 L. ed. 1092, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900.

The objection that the "bill is lacking in allegations necessary to establish jurisdiction of the circuit court" is not well taken. Herbert v. Rainey, 54 Fed. Rep. 248-251; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 19 L. R. A. 387, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 522, 54 Fed. Rep. 730.

The decree is reversed, and the cause will be remanded to the circuit court, with direction to enter a decree disallowing the demurrer to the bill of complaint, and with leave to the defendant to answer within such time as that court may prescribe.

A. FLYGARE et al., Appts.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. A rural highway authorized to be laid out and established by chapter 302, Laws 1895, is not a "local improvement" within the meaning of § 1, art. 9, of the Constitution.
2. Said chapter 302, Laws 1895, is unconstitutional and void as in violation of § 1, art. 9, of the Constitution, which requires all taxes to be as nearly equal as may be.

(June 26, 1900.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Kandiyohi County overruling a demurrer to a complaint filed to enjoin the issuing of bonds to pay for the establishment of a highway. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel Fish and Eli Torrance, with Mr. Samuel Porter, for appellants:

It is for the legislature to say what public improvements are local.

As the state Constitution stood prior to 1869, all taxes were to be "as nearly equal as may be," and were to be based upon the equalized cash valuation of "all property on which taxes are to be levied."

While the Constitution was in that form this court held that assessments for public purposes, upon the basis of benefits conferred, were prohibited.

Stinson v. Smith, 8 Minn. 366, Gil. 326; Bidwell v. Coleman, 11 Minn. 78, Gil. 45; Comer v. Folsom, 13 Minn. 219, Gil. 205; Dowd v. Sibley County, 36 Minn. 430, 31 N. W. 517.

These holdings led to the adoption, in 1869, of the first proviso, whereby the cash-valuation rule was abrogated in so far as it applied to local improvements undertaken by municipal corporations. This proviso simply reinvests the legislature with its original, unlimited authority over the subject of taxation for local improvements. Counties are municipal corporations within the meaning of the proviso.

County commissioners and town supervisors, in establishing rural highways, are expressly empowered to offset benefits against damages in determining the amount of compensation to be awarded for lands taken or injured.

The usual constitutional provision prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without compensation is a limitation on the exercise by the state of the right of eminent domain, and not a limitation on the taxing power.

Mr. A. B. Choate, with Messrs. Brown, Reed, Merrill, & Buffington and Olson & Johnson, for respondent:

No absolute right to be heard is secured to the owner whose property, that is money, is to be taken for the building of a road. Such a provision does not constitute due process of law.

State ex rel. Blaisdell v. Billings, 55 Minn. 467, 57 N. W. 206, 794.

The legislature of this state is restricted in its power to levy taxes to the method of general assessments in proportion to cash valuation.

Stinson v. Smith, 8 Minn. 366, Gil. 326; Bidwell v. Coleman, 11 Minn. 78, Gil. 45.

The power of the legislature to defray the cost of public improvements by imposing taxes upon certain districts, under the method of general levy on the basis of cash valuation, had been found adequate for all purposes.

Guilder v. Otsego, 20 Minn. 74, Gil. 59; Guilder v. Dayton, 22 Minn. 366.

It is not competent for the legislature to authorize the levying of special assessments in proportion to benefits, except by committing the whole matter to the local authorities, whose business it shall be, not only to levy the assessment, but to apportion it in proportion to benefits, and therefore to determine what district or territory is benefited, and the benefits to each particular tract in the district.

Malby v. Tautges, 50 Minn. 253, 52 N. W. 858; Davidson v. Ramsey County Comrs. 18 Minn. 482, Gil. 432.

The legislature has failed to maintain the distinction between what it may do itself and what it may authorize others to do, and it has assumed to exercise functions which the people have only empowered it to authorize local authorities to exercise, and for this reason the act is void.

Welty, Assessments, § 275.

If more is taken as an assessment than the special benefit conferred, it is, as to such excess, private property unjustly taken for public use without compensation to the owner.

Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187; Chamberlain v. Cleveland, 34 Ohio St. 551; State ex rel. Scotten v. Brill, 58 Minn. 152, 59 N. W. 989; *Johnson v. The power to make assessments is a delegated power, and is subject to restrictions imposed by the terms in which it is delegated; hence the constitutional authority to lay assessments according to benefits does not authorize assessments arbitrarily levied.

Welty, Assessments, § 275.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to restrain and enjoin the defendants, board of county commissioners and auditor of Kandiyohi county, from issuing and negotiating the bonds of the county under and pursuant to chapter 302, Laws 1895, to pay the cost and expense of locating and establishing a public highway under the terms of such law. Defendants demurred to the complaint, and appealed from an order overruling the same.

The act under which defendants are threatening to proceed, and which fully warrants the threatened action if valid and constitutional, is an evident attempt on the part of the legislature to extend the law of assessments for local improvements, heretofore, with respect to streets and the improvement thereof, confined exclusively to municipal corporations proper, to rural roads and highways to be laid out by county commissioners. Just why the legislature should deem it wise and prudent to do so is not clear. It is quite well known that assessments for the improvement of streets and sidewalks in our larger cities have proved exceedingly burdensome to property owners, and in some instances reached a point well-nigh to confiscation. Property owners of moderate means have been compelled to abandon their property, or sacrifice it by sale for much less than its actual value to avoid total loss. Owners of agricultural lands have hardships quite heavy enough to bear, and if any reasons exist for thrusting upon them the additional burdens incident to the "local-improvement" system of taxation, as practised and enforced in cities, they are not apparent to the casual observer. Taxation according to benefits as applied to improvements in the streets of a city is very different when applied to a country highway. In the city the improvement will benefit and improve the property adjacent to, and abutting upon, the improved street, but will not benefit property remote therefrom, while in the country districts the highway is an advantage to the public at large, and the benefit thereof is not confined to farms through which it may pass. It is therefore reasonable to require the benefited city property to pay the expense of the improvement, while it would not be reasonable or just or fair to require the farms along the line of a country road to pay the entire cost and expense of opening and laying the same out. In a case in Pennsylvania, where there was a similar attempt to extend this system into the country districts, the supreme court said: "To apply it [that is, taxation according to benefits] to the country and to farm lands would lead to such inequality and injustice as to deprive it of all sacredness as a rule or as a substitute for a fair and impartial valuation of benefits in pursuance of law, so that at the very first blush everyone would pronounce it to be palpably unreasonable and unjust. . . . Whether we view this avenue as a macadamized highway, 7 miles long or 300, the result is the same to those along its route. To charge its cost upon the farms lying within 1 mile on each side, at a fixed sum per acre, is so obviously onerous and unreasonable, and leads to such a destruction of private right, and such unfairness of imposition for the advantage of the public at large and of individuals who pay nothing, it cannot, on any fair principle of reasoning, be said to be a valuation according to benefits." Washington Ave. Case, 69 Pa. 352, 8 Am. Rep. 255. Such a law was declared invalid in Kentucky. Graham v. Conger, 85 Ky. 582, 4 S. W. 327.

The act under consideration authorizes the county commissioners of each county in the state to lay out and establish county roads and highways, and to charge and assess the cost and expense thereof to all lands lying within 1 mile of the highway, with certain exceptions, according to benefits received. Such assessments are not limited to the amount of benefits received, but the lands are made to pay the entire cost of the road, whether such cost exceed the benefits or not. But one question was argued in this court, and that with reference to the constitutionality of the act. It is assailed in several particulars, but as we deem and hold it unconstitutional on the ground that the highways thereby authorized to be laid out are not "local improvements," within the meaning of § 1 of article 9 of the Constitution of the state, our consideration of the act will be confined to that question.

As originally adopted, the Constitution required all taxes to be as "nearly equal as may be," and while in this form it was held to prohibit special or local assessments for public purposes based on benefits. Stinson v. Smith, 8 Minn. 366, Gil. 326; Bidwell v. Coleman, 11 Minn. 78, Gil. 45; Comer v. Folsom, 13 Minn. 219, Gil. 205. To obviate the effect of these decisions, and in the interests of local improvements of a public nature, but so specially beneficial to private interests as to make it unjust to resort to the public treasury to pay therefor, the Constitution was amended in 1869 by exempting from this equality provision assessments for local improvements by municipal corporations. So that unless the laying out of a rural highway is a "local improvement," within the meaning of the amended Constitution, the act in question is invalid, as a violation of the requirement that all taxes be equal, within the above decisions. The term "local improvements" was defined by this court in Rogers v. St. Paul, 22 Minn. 494, as follows: "By common usage, especially as evidenced by the practice of courts and text writers, the term 'local improvements' is employed as signifying improvements made in a particular locality by which the real property adjoining or near such locality is specially benefited. . . . An examination of these authorities will also show that the term 'local improvements,' or terms synonymous, are more commonly applied to the grading, curbing, and paving of streets than to any other class of improvements. Our Constitution is to be presumed to have employed the term 'local improvements' in 49 L. R. A.

the sense which is thus attributed to it by common usage." Prior to and ever since the adoption of the constitutional amendment roads and highways in the country districts were and have been laid out, established, and improved at the expense of the public at large. Damages for laying out such roads have been paid from the public treasury, and at no time have farm lands been assessed therefor, any further than in assessing damages, benefits to the land through which the highway passes have been deducted from the amount awarded to the landowner. But benefits accruing to the public generally have never been considered or allowed in reduction of individual damages. Until the passage of this act a rural highway was not understood to come within the meaning or to constitute a local improvement, and if sustained it will completely change the method heretofore in existence and employed for laying out and establishing such road. The term "local improvements" has been most generally used and employed in reference to improvements by municipal corporations proper, rather than to counties and towns, which are only quasi municipal corporations. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 22. And such has been the direction of legislation. With respect to the construction of ditches for draining wet and swampy lands in the interests of the public welfare, and assessing the expense thereof to the lands benefited, a county has been held to be a municipal corporation, and such ditches local improvements, within the meaning of the Constitution. Dowlan v. Sibley County, 36 Minn. 430, 31 N. W. 517. But that decision can have no controlling force or effect with reference to the question here in hand. The construction of ditches for the purposes just stated operates peculiarly to the benefit of the lands adjacent to the ditch. Such lands are thereby reclaimed, and made suitable and fit for agricultural purposes, and it is proper and just that the lands so specially benefited and improved should pay the cost and expense incident to the improvement. This is true also with respect to the improvement of public streets of a municipal corporation proper, such as paving, construction of sewers, and laying sidewalks, all resulting in and constituting a special benefit to the property adjacent to, and abutting upon, the improved street. But not so with reference to farm lands adjoining a public road. Such road is not a special benefit to the farm, or the owner thereof, independent of, and unconnected with, the public benefit. It might be such a benefit if in its construction and improvement it drained wet and swampy portions of the land, or improved the same in some other special way. But such highways are not ordinarily beneficial in those respects. In speaking on the subject of local improvements in the case of State ex rel. Stetler v. Reis, 38 Minn. 371, 38 N. W. 97, Mitchell, J., said: "It is not the agency used, or its comparative durability, but the result accomplished, which must determine whether a work is an improvement in the sense in which that word is here used. The only essential elements of a 'local improvement' are those which the term itself implies, viz., that it shall benefit the property on which the cost is assessed in a manner local in its nature, and not enjoyed by property generally. . . . This construction is fully warranted by the definitions of the word 'improvement' given by lexicographers. It has been defined as 'that by which the value of anything is increased, its excellence enhanced, or the like;' or 'an amelioration of the condition of property affected by the expenditure of labor or money, for the purpose of rendering it useful for other purposes than those for which it was originally used, or more useful for the same purposes.' A rural highway does not come within this definition. Such a "road is devoted to the public use. It is a country road in which the entire public is interested, and where the owners of adjacent land, although not touching the road, are equally benefited with those living directly upon it." Graham v. Conger, 85 Ky. 582, 4 S. W. 327. A highway extending through a county is not ordinarily of any greater benefit to lands through which it passes than to lands farther removed therefrom. And, if this act be upheld, the burden of laying out and establishing country roads will hereafter be borne by the few for the benefit of the public generally. A construction of our law that would work such an injustice should not be adopted.

The legislature may, no doubt, create and establish taxing districts, and provide for the taxation of lands therein for public improvements necessary to, and in the interests of, the district, but such was not the object or purpose of this act. The plain object of it was, as expressed by the learned judge below in his order overruling the demurrer, an attempt on the part of the legislature to "stamp all rural highways as local improvements." It provides that owners of land within 1 mile of the highway laid out thereunder shall pay the cost and expense thereof. It creates no district for taxing or other purposes, but simply selects a few landowners to discharge a burden that should be assumed by all, or at least by those who are equally benefited by the improvement. The question as to the power and authority of the legislature in establishing taxing districts for the purposes of public improvements is not, therefore, before us. The act cannot be sustained on the district theory. In view of all these considerations, we are constrained to hold that a rural highway is not a "local improvement," within the meaning of the Constitution, and that the act in question is invalid.

We have examined and considered the suggestions of counsel for appellant that the act may be sustained with the assessment feature eliminated, but we cannot see our way clear to so hold. We are not prepared to say that with such feature stricken therefrom the legislature would have passed the act. Indeed, without it the act is shorn of its principal feature, and its whole purpose is gone.

Our conclusion is in accord with that reached by the learned judge of the court below, and his order in the premises is affirmed.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY of Hartford, Connecticut, Plff. in Err.,

v.
J. W. MYERS et al.

- *1. Policies of insurance should be construed, like other contracts, so as to give effect to the intention and express language of the parties. West v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 27 Ohio St. 1, 22 Am. Rep. 294, approved and followed.
2. In a policy which insures against loss from liability to employees of the insured who may accidentally sustain bodily injury while in the employ of the insured "under circumstances which shall impose upon the insured a common-law or statutory liability to such employees by reason thereof," a stipulation as follows: "Immediate written notice shall be given this company of any accident and of all alleged injuries, together with copies of all statements made by employees, and all other information in possession or knowledge of the insured in any way relating to such accident or liability therefor,"—is of the essence of the contract, and cannot be waived by an agent of the company without authority therefor.

3. When such policy contains a stipulation that "no agent has authority to waive or alter anything in this policy contained," and the same is accepted by the insured, it is both notice to and an agreement by the insured that an agent has no authority to waive or alter anything contained in the policy. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Hook, 62 Ohio St. 258, 56 N. E. 906, approved and followed.
4. "Immediate written notice" in such stipulation means written notice within a reasonable time under the circumstances of the case; and, where the facts are not disputed, what is a reasonable time is a question of law.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ashland County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under an employer's liability insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Davis, J.:

The action was brought in the court of common pleas of Ashland county to recover under a policy of insurance issued to the defendant in error "against loss from liability to employees of the insured who may accidentally sustain bodily injuries while on the pay roll of the insured, and while actually occupied by the performance of duty in the trade or occupation for which they have been employed by the insured, and under circumstances which shall impose upon the insured the common-law or statutory liability to such employees by reason thereof." This policy contained the following stipulation: "Immediate written notice shall be given this company of any accident, and of all alleged injuries, together with copies of all statements made by employees and all other information in possession or knowledge of the insured in any way relating to such accident or liability thereof." And also the following stipulation: "No agent has authority to waive or alter anything in this policy contained." During the term of this policy,—that is, on October 27, 1894,—Simon Custer, an employee of the defendants in error, sustained certain personal injuries. This fact was communicated verbally by the insured to one Mason, who was at that time the local soliciting agent of the plaintiff in error at Ashland, in Ashland county, Ohio. Mason told the plaintiffs (defendants in error here) not to do anything further at the present time, for likely the man would never say anything, and that such an investigation into the circumstances of the accident as would be necessary in procuring statements of witnesses and employees might arouse the suspicion of Custer, and cause him to make a claim for damages, and that, if any claim was made by Custer, the plaintiffs should inform Mason of the same and he would attend to it. Acting on this suggestion of Mason's, the insured gave no notice to the insurance company until July 22, 1895,—nearly nine months after the accident to Simon Custer had occurred. Custer made no claim upon his employers for the injury until July 18, 1895, and then claimed that the injury which he had received had developed into a serious difficulty. Promptly on receipt of the notice given July 22, 1895,—that is, on July 23, 1895,—the insurance company declined to recognize the claim of the insured on the ground that the insured had not complied with the stipulations of the policy that immediate written notice be furnished to them of all accidents, and with the necessary statements of the circumstances relating to the liability. The case was tried in the common pleas court upon an agreed statement of facts, a jury being waived. The court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and upon petition in error to the circuit court the judgment was affirmed. The case comes into this court upon petition in error to reverse the judgments of the common pleas and circuit courts.

Messrs. Day, Lynch, & Day, for plaintiff in error:

After the issuing and delivery of the policy to J. W. Myers & Co. the express stipulation therein controlled as to form of notice, time of giving notice, and the limitation upon the power of agents.

When J. W. Myers & Co. received this policy they were presumed to know and accept all its terms and conditions.

West v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 27 Ohio St. 1, 22 Am. Rep. 294; Quinlan v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 133 N. Y. 356, 31 N. E. 31.

When the policy of insurance, as in this case, contains an express limitation upon the power of the agent, such agent has no legal right to contract as agent of the company, with the insured, so as to change the conditions of the policy or dispense with the provisions of any essential requisite contained therein.

Maier v. Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. 47 U. S. App. 322, 78 Fed. Rep. 566, 24 C. C. A. 239; Quinlan v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 133 N. Y. 356, 31 N. E. 31; Walsh v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 10.

In determining the question of liability in this case it is immaterial whether the plaintiff read the policy or not, or that he had no actual knowledge of the conditions or of the limitations of the power of Kelsy. The conditions and limitations were a part of the contract, and he was bound to take notice of them.

Carey v. German American Ins. Co. 84 Wis. 80, 20 L. R. A. 267, 54 N. W. 18; Kirkman v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 90 Iowa, 457, 57 N. W. 952; Martin v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 84 Iowa, 516, 51 N. The failure to perform a condition of the contract cannot be waived by an agent, when the contract itself declares that he shall not have power to waive it.

Mr. H. A. Mykrants, for defendants in error:

Insurance companies must not be surprised if they are held to strict accountability for the conduct of their agents while acting in what appears to be the scope of their employment.

Massachusetts L. Ins. Co. v. Eshelman, 30 Ohio St. 647.

Whatever fault there was in this transaction, if it may be called a fault, was wholly that of the agent, who was then acting for the company, and not the fault of the insured. If, then, either party must suffer from such omission or neglect of the agent, it should be the party whose agent was derelict.

Union Ins. Co. v. McGookey, 33 Ohio St. 565.

There was a full and complete compliance with all the provisions of the contract of insurance by the defendant in error.

Provision 4 of the policy, calling for immediate written notice of all injuries to employees and claims made by them, was fully complied with by defendants in error by the written advices given to plaintiff in error in July, 1895.

Defendants in error gave plaintiff in error immediate written notice of the claims of the employee Custer as soon as they had any knowledge of any claim made by said Custer.

Where, by the conditions of a policy, notice of loss is required to be given forthwith, it is only necessary that such notice be given with due diligence under the circumstances of the case.

If it be left in doubt, in view of the general tenor of the instrument and the relation of the contracting parties, whether given words were used in an enlarged or a restricted sense, or other things being equal, 49 L. R. A.

that construction should be adopted which is most beneficial to the promisee.

If Mason, agent of the plaintiff in error, was by giving such directions acting beyond his authority, it was without the knowledge of the defendants in error, and the latter had a right to believe from said agent's statements and conduct that he was acting within the scope of his employment, as would naturally be apparent to any reasonable man.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Policies of insurance, like other contracts, should be reasonably construed, so as not to defeat the intention and express language of the parties. West v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 27 Ohio St. 1, 22 Am. Rep. 294. It was agreed by the parties to this contract of insurance that immediate written notice should be given to the company of any accident and of all alleged injuries, together with copies of all statements made by employees, and all other information in possession or knowledge of the insured in any way relating to such accident or liability therefor. It is obvious that this stipulation is of the essence of the contract in insurance of this kind. It is not merely a stipulation as to the form of bringing to the notice of the insurer the fact of a loss, as in policies of fire and life insurance. It is clearly a matter of substance in the contract, because the obligation of the insurer is not against the mere happening of an accident or an injury, but against "loss from liability" to employees who may be accidentally injured while in the employ of the insured "under circumstances which shall impose upon the insured a common-law or statutory liability to such employees by reason thereof." The occurrence of an accident and injury, however slight, if it may result in a legal liability to an employee of the insured, would necessarily involve an inquiry into the facts and circumstances which may make the insured liable; and these must be communicated to the insurer, else there would be no notice to the insurer that there had been anything more than an accident without liability. In insurance of this character it is a matter of the first importance to the insurer, who may be forced to become the real defendant in a lawsuit against the insured employer, to be speedily informed of all the facts and witnesses concerning a possible litigation. In a very little time the facts may, in a great measure, fade out of memory, or become distorted; witnesses may go beyond reach; physical conditions may change; and, more dangerous than all, fraud and cupidity may have had opportunity to perfect their work. Therefore this stipulation is vital to the contract; and it need not be surprising that the policy contains an agreement that it shall not be waived by any agent, for it is declared by the insurer and accepted by the insured that "no agent has authority to waive or alter anything in this policy contained." It is not claimed that written notice was given to the company at the time of the alleged accident and injury, nor for almost nine months thereafter; and it does not appear from the record that the company was at any time furnished with copies of all or any statements made by employees, and all other information in possession or knowledge of the insured in any way relating to such accident or liability therefor. Immediate notice means notice within a reasonable time, and, when the facts are not disputed, what is a reasonable time is a question of law. American F. Ins. Co. v. Hazen, 110 Pa. 530, 1 Atl. 605; Kimball v. Howard F. Ins. Co. 8 Gray, 33; Bennett v. Lycoming County Mut. Ins. Co. 67 N. Y. 274. There was nothing in the circumstances of this case to require or justify the delay of such notice for a period of nine months, and much to indicate that such delay was positively prejudicial to the insurer. But it is answered that the insured gave to the insurer immediate written notice of the claims of the employee who was injured, as soon as the insured had any knowledge of any claim being made by the employee. Notice of the claims of the injured employee, however, is not the thing stipulated for. The contract is that immediate written notice—that is, within a reasonable time—shall be given of any accident and of all alleged injuries, together with information relating to liability therefor. This was not done. From the record of this case we are able to say that the proper notice could have been given within a few days after the accident, as well as, or better than, nine months afterwards. The insured undertook at their own peril to decide whether there was or would be a liability or not, and whether the injury received was severe enough to require the stipulated notice to be given. Having assumed that hazard, and realized their mistake, they have no one to blame but themselves that they are left without a remedy.

Equally unavailing for the defendants in error is the claim that the stipulation for notice was waived by Mason, the insurance company's local soliciting agent, or that the company is estopped to plead the contract in defense, by misleading statements made by Mason. The apparent scope of Mason's authority did not justify the insured in accepting and relying upon his words when this accident was verbally reported to him. He was a mere soliciting agent, and was invested with none of the powers of a general agent or of a special adjusting agent. It does not appear to us that he was intrusted with any duties in regard to receiving and transmitting notice or of adjustment between the parties to the policy. So far as we are informed, his duties ended when he received and transmitted to the company the application of the insured for the insurance. Therefore the defendants in error had no right to rely on his advice or suggestions in regard to a matter which was not within the apparent scope of his authority, and still less could they so rely on his advice when it was distinctly contrary to the contract stipulations. It was further expressly stipulated in the policy that "no agent has authority to waive or alter anything in this policy contained." The policy is not unilateral. Since the insured have received, accepted, and retained the policy, they are parties to it, although not signing it, and are presumed to know and accept all of its terms and conditions. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Hook, 62 Ohio St. 256, 56 N. E. 906. The insured, having agreed that the stipulation as to notice could not be waived or altered by an agent, cannot excuse themselves for nonperformance of the contract as to notice to the company by showing that they acted on the suggestion of the soliciting agent that they should not perform the contract as they had made it. In this conclusion we are sustained by numerous decisions in other states. We cite only a few of them. Carey v. German American Ins. Co. 84 Wis. 80, 20 L. R. A. 267, 54 N. W. 18; Smith v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 60 Vt. 682, 1 L. R. A. 216, 15 Atl. 353; Porter v. United States L. Ins. Co. 160 Mass. 183, 35 N. E. 678; Walsh v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 10; Kirkman v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 90 Iowa, 457, 57 N. W. 952; Gould v. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. 90 Mich. 302, 51 N. W. 455; German Ins. Co. v. Heiduk, 30 Neb. 288, 46 N. W. 481; Ermentrout v. Girard F. & M. Ins. Co. 63 Minn. 305, 310, 30 L. R. A. 346, 65 N. W. 635.

We are aware that there are decisions to the effect that conditions in respect to notice and proofs of loss may be waived by an agent, notwithstanding a provision that no agent can change the same. Those decisions are put upon the ground that such limitations on the authority of agents apply only to provisions relating solely to the formation and continuance of the policy, and which are essential to the binding force of the contract while it is running, and do not apply to conditions which are to be performed after the loss has occurred, such as giving notice and proof of loss. While we prefer to put the decision of this case on the grounds of, and in line with, the decisions already stated, we think that we have made it sufficiently clear that the stipulation as to notice in this policy is of the very substance of the contract in insurance of the kind here contracted for, and therefore could not be waived by any agent. The court of common pleas erred in rendering judgment for the defendants in error upon the conceded facts, and the circuit court erred in affirming the judgment of the court of common pleas.

The judgments of both courts are reversed, and the judgment is for plaintiff in error.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

George FOOTE et al., Appts.,
v.
AMERICAN PRODUCT COMPANY.

(195 Pa. 190.)

1. The rider of a bicycle is not required to give way to a heavily laden wagon when turning a corner and keeping on the right side of the street, as required by the law of the road and the express terms of an ordinance, unless some apparent necessity is shown for an exception to the rule.
2. One riding a bicycle, as he approaches a corner, keeping on the right side of the street, has a right to assume that the driver of a wagon approaching the corner from another direction will keep to the right if they meet, so that the bicycle can pass between the wagon and the curb.
3. A boy on a bicycle, who is placed in a dangerous position by the negligence or carelessness of the driver of a wagon, will not be held to the same strict measure of care as under ordinary circumstances, in attempting to release himself from the perilous situation.
4. An ordinance requiring vehicles, when meeting and passing, to keep to the right, is admissible in evidence on the question of negligence in a collision.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for negligent injuries to the minor plaintiff while he was riding a bicycle along the public street. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Richard C. Dale, for appellants:

That the driver of a garbage cart is entitled to violate the fundamental law of the road, and, by grinding his wagon against the curb to the left, crush down the rider on a wheel, who, in obedience to the law of the road, has kept to the right, is a proposition which it is most important should be thoroughly understood, if it is hereafter to be regarded as the law.

Taylor v. Union Traction Co. 6 Pa. Dist. R. 365; Com. v. Dooley, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 381.

Mr. Maurice W. Sloan, for appellee:

The fact that the defendant was turning the southeast corner of Seventeenth and Spruce streets is no evidence of negligence. The law does not require a traveler to drive over any particular portion of the road. The obligation is to turn to the right when met by others.

Brooks v. Thomas, 42 Phila. Leg. Int. 120.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence on the part of the plaintiffs tended to establish the following facts: On the afternoon of September 1, 1897, Benjamin Foote, one of the plaintiffs, a boy of twelve years, was riding a bicycle on the east side of Seventeenth street, in the city of Philadelphia. He had been on an errand for his mother, and came from Pine street, and was going north towards Spruce street. Edward H. Cloud, Esq., came out of De Lancey street, which is a short distance south of Spruce street, on a bicycle, and followed him on the east side of the street at a distance of 50 or 75 feet. As the boy neared the foot crossing at the corner of Seventeenth and Spruce streets, he met the garbage wagon of the defendant, and was struck by it, or was thrown by trying to save himself in dismounting, and fell with his left foot under the rear wheel of the wagon. The wheel passed over his foot, inflicting severe injuries. The boy was riding at an ordinary rate of speed, and rang his bell as he approached Spruce street. The garbage wagon was a four-wheeled vehicle, drawn by one horse. It came west on Spruce street, and turned south at the southeast corner of Spruce and Seventeenth streets, "hugging the curb," and so close thereto that the boy could not pass between it and the curb. The wagon made an angle of about 45 degrees with the east curb line of Seventeenth street, and the horse was more nearly parallel with the street; the apparent intention of the driver being to proceed south along the east side of Seventeenth street. At or near the street crossing the boy first saw the wagon, which was then directly in front of him, and he immediately began to check his speed by back-pedaling. In thus attempting to prevent a collision with the wagon and to dismount, the right pedal of his bicycle struck the curb, and he was thrown to the left, under the left rear wheel of the wagon. When the wagon turned into Seventeenth street, the horse was going at a moderate rate, and was stopped a few feet from the place of the accident. When the boy first saw the wagon, the rear wheel was not clear of the Seventeenth street curb, but when it ran over his foot it was about 2 feet from the curb. An ordinance of the city of Philadelphia, approved February 2, 1897, provides that "all persons driving or riding upon the streets or highways of the city, whether on horseback, in carriages, wagons, or other vehicles, or upon bicycles, tricycles, or other mechanical contrivances, shall at all times drive on the road upon the right side of the street or highway, and shall pass all vehicles traveling in the opposite direction by driving or riding to the right of such vehicle or pass all vehicles traveling in the same direction by driving or riding to the left of such vehicles."

At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' testimony, the court directed the jury to render a verdict for the defendant. No reasons were assigned for the action of the court, and the record is equally silent as to the reason for the refusal of a new trial. Where binding instructions are given to the jury, or where the court refuses to take off a compulsory nonsuit, the reasons for this action of the court should be at least briefly stated. This very frequently would prevent an appeal, by enabling the counsel to see the correctness of the court's position; and, if an appeal should be taken, it would aid very materially the appellate court, as well as counsel, in an intelligent review of the case. The action of the court in giving binding instructions to the jury to find for the defendant can only be sustained upon the ground that the evidence failed to disclose negligence on the part of the driver of the wagon, or that it established negligence on the part of the boy. The rights and duties of the boy and the driver of the garbage wagon on the highways of the city were reciprocal. Each was required to obey the law of the road, and to conform to its requirements. "By the law and the custom of the land, it is the duty of persons traveling in wagons or other vehicles, meeting each other on the public road, to pass on the right-hand side of the road. . . . The law or custom . . . applies to, and is intended to regulate the duty and conduct of, those traveling on the road, as between themselves." Grier v. Sampson, 27 Pa. 188. The evidence in the case at bar did not justify the court in declaring, as a matter of law, that the boy was within the well-recognized exception to the rule stated,—that a light vehicle or bicycle must give way to a heavily laden wagon. There was no apparent necessity here for the application of this exception to the rule. Under the act of April 23, 1889, the boy had the same right, and was subjected to the same restrictions, in the use of his bicycle, as a person using a carriage drawn by a horse. That he was riding the bicycle, therefore, did not deprive him of the protection of the law of the road, but required the driver of the garbage wagon to accord to him the same privileges and rights in the street as though he were using a carriage. In passing north along the east side of Seventeenth street, the boy was where he had a right to be, and where, if traveling on the street in that direction, the law of the road, as well as the city ordinance, required him to be. When the collision occurred, the driver was turning his wagon around the southeast corner of Spruce and Seventeenth streets, and the plaintiffs claim that it was with the intention of going south on the east side of the street. When no one was approaching with a desire to pass him with a vehicle, the driver had the right to use any part of the street not occupied by another; yet when he turned abruptly on Seventeenth street, in the manner shown by the testimony, he was taking the chance of a collision with other travelers going north on that street, whose rights at that place were superior to his. Whether the boy could have seen the wagon on the street in time to prevent the collision, as claimed by the defendant, was not for the court to determine, under the circumstances shown by the testimony. Nor was it for the court to say that his effort to free himself from his danger was a negligent act contributing to his injury. Even if he saw the wagon on Spruce street as he approached the corner, unless he could also see that it was too close to the curb to permit him to pass, he had a right to assume that the driver, if he did turn on Seventeenth street, would keep to the right, so that he could pass between the wagon and the curb. This was the rule of the road, and he had a right to act on the expectation that the driver would observe it. Baker v. Fehr, 97 Pa. 70. If, acting on this assumption, without any fault on his part the boy was placed in a dangerous position by the negligence or carelessness of the driver, he will not be held to the same strict measure of care as under ordinary circumstances, in attempting to relieve himself from a perilous situation.

We are of opinion that the case should have been submitted to the jury, with proper instructions as to the rights and duties of the parties at the time of the accident. The facts developed by the plaintiffs' evidence did not warrant the court in saying, as a matter of law, that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, or that the boy's negligence contributed to his injuries. The facts of the case, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, were clearly for the jury.

The objection by the defendant to the city ordinance offered in evidence by the plaintiffs was not well taken. While the ordinance in itself was not evidence of negligence, it may be considered, with other evidence, in ascertaining whether the defendant was guilty of negligence. Lederman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 165 Pa. 118, 30 Atl. 725.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo is awarded.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

A. W. WYSONG, Admr., etc., of F. K. Rambo, Deceased,
v.

E. K. RAMBO et al.

W. A. LONDON et al., Appts.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. Interest on advancements of land to some of the heirs of a person, which were made for the purpose of equalizing the share of another heir, should be allowed only from the death of the ancestor until the lapse of a reasonable time for the settlement of the estate, where the heir whose share was to be equalized failed to take any steps to procure the settlement for many years after the ancestor's death, and in the meantime permitted the other heirs to enjoy the possession of their lands.

2. The difference between the value of land at the time of the assignment of dower and homestead and at the time when those estates fell in is not an increment to the estate, within the meaning of a rule for allowance of interest on advancements up to the amount of an increment to the estate, since the additional value accrues merely by the removal of an encumbrance.

(November 4, 1899.)

A PPEAL by W. A. London et al. from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals modifying a decree of the Chancery Court for Marshall County equalizing advancements for the settlement of the estate of F. K. Rambo, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court of Chancery Appeals delivered by NEIL, J., as follows:

This is an appeal from the county court,

and presents a controversy between the heirs of F. K. Rambo upon the subject of advancements. The case is this: On the 8th of October, 1877, F. K. Rambo died intestate in Marshall county, and left surviving him his widow, Mary B. Rambo, and the following children; David Rambo, E. K. Rambo, B. F. Rambo, John F. Rambo, W. W. Rambo, and G. W. Rambo,—being six sons, besides another son, M. V. Rambo, who died a short time before his father, leaving several children. F. K. Rambo owned at his death about 101 acres of land in Marshall county. After his death his widow had homestead and dower assigned to her, which comprised about 76 acres. The residue of the land was sold to pay his debts. The widow kept the homestead and dower until her death, which event occurred on the 17th of March, 1899. On the 8th of April, 1899, the present bill was filed. A few years before his death, F. K. Rambo advanced to each one of his children, except M. V. Rambo, land to the value of $500. To M. V. Rambo nothing was advanced. The heirs of M. V. Rambo sold their interest in the land and in the estate of their grandfather to W. A. London and Scott D. Davis, and these persons appear in the cause, and claim participation in the account of advancements which was ordered. The heirs of John F. Rambo are each owners, by their ancestor's purchase of the shares of W. W. Rambo and George W. Rambo. One purpose for which the bill in this case was filed was to sell the land for the purpose of division, as well as for a settlement of advancements. During the progress of the cause the land (that is, the land which was formerly the widow's homestead and dower, but had become disencumbered by her death) was sold, and brought the sum of $1,652. At the time of the death of F. K. Rambo, his widow was sixty-eight years old; and the reversionary interests in the homestead and dower were together worth at that time, taking into consideration her expectancy under the mortality tables, the sum of $1,300. The land has not increased in value since the death of F. K. Rambo, but has deteriorated to the extent of about 20 per cent. However, the shares of the representative heirs are now worth more than they were worth at the death of the testator, but this enhanced value arises from the falling in of the life estate of the widow. The difference in value is represented by the difference between what the property sold for at the clerk's sale, $1,652, and the said $1,300; that is, $352. During the life of the widow the entire proceeds of the land now in controversy were appropriated to her use and benefit, by reason of the fact that this land had been assigned to her, and was claimed by her as homestead and dower. The chairman of the county court referred the case to the clerk, to report the amount of advancements each one of the seven children had received, and the amount at which the same should be charged. He reported that each one of the seven heirs had received $500, as already stated, except M. V. Rambo, and that interest should be charged upon each of these sums of $500 from the death of F. K. Rambo, the ancestor of the said seven sons. To this report David Rambo, B. F. Rambo, E. K. Rambo, and the children of John F. Rambo filed exceptions, and these exceptions were sustained by the chairman. He thereupon decreed that W. A. London and Scott Davis should receive out of the first purchase money paid in the sum of $500, to make them equal with each of the other six heirs, and that the rest of the fund, after the payment of costs, should be equally divided between the seven shares. From this decree London and Davis have appealed and assigned errors.

The only question presented is whether interest should be charged upon the advancements from the death of F. K. Rambo, October 8, 1877, to the date of the final decree rendered on the 16th of September, 1899. Both sides rely with much confidence upon the reported decisions of the supreme court, and, in order to a true solution of the question, it will be necessary to review the question as it appears in all the Reports.

The first case is Burton v. Dickinson, 3 Yerg. 112, decided in March, 1832. That case contained mere dictum,—no real decision upon the question. The following language occurs in that opinion: "It is insisted that the negroes ought to have been valued at their worth when Colonel Murfree died, without adding thereto the increase by births, by growth, and the value of their labor for five years, and, putting this together as a common fund, and dividing it amongst all the children, advanced and unadvanced, deducting the advancements from the allotments to the elder children. On the other hand, it is insisted that the negroes advanced in 1799 to Mrs. Dickinson, and to Mrs. Hilliard in 1801, ought to have been estimated at their worth when advanced, which mistake in complainant's favor would produce nearly the same result that the two errors produced, were the position of complainant correct. That both positions were correct, we have little doubt," etc. This, however, as above stated, was dictum, not a decision.

So the matter stood until Morris v. Morris, 9 Heisk. 814, 822, decided at the April term, 1872. In this case it is said: "It is a well-settled rule that interest will not be charged on advancements." It is not clear from the opinion whether this refers to interest before the death of the ancestor or afterwards, but the case is cited in a subsequent decision, to which we will refer presently, as having had reference to interest between the date of the advancement and the death of the ancestor.

The next case is McNairy v. McNairy, 1 Tenn. Cas. 329, 332 et seq., decided at the December term, 1874. This is the leading case upon the subject in the state, and deserves to be specially noted. It is referred to and relied on in all the subsequent cases, except one. In this case Judge McFarland says: "The next question we dispose of is in regard to interest upon advancements. The advancements set forth in the bill to the several children are in unequal amounts. It is well settled that interest is not chargeable upon advancements previous to the death of the testator or intestate. It is supposed that up to the death of the intestate the other children not advanced receive other benefits equal to that received by the advanced children from the use of the advancement. M'Dougald v. King, Bail. Eq. 155. But it is argued that after the death, or the time fixed for division, interest should be charged upon the advancements up to the time the division or distribution actually takes place, in order to preserve equality. There are cases which seem to favor this doctrine. See the case above referred to, and Daves v. Haywood, 54 N. C. (1 Jones, Eq.) 253; Hamer v. Hamer, 4 Strobb. Eq. 124. In some cases this would reach the proper result. The true theory, we apprehend, is that the partition and distribution should be made as at the death of the intestate, or at the time fixed by the will in cases of intestacy; the property or funds to be valued as at that time, and the advancements be charged as received at that time. See M'Dougald v. King, Bail. Eq. 155; Burton v. Dickinson, 3 Yerg. 112. If the actual division is postponed beyond this time, and the corpus of the fund or property left for division does not increase by way of interest or profits, then it could hardly be proper to charge the advanced child interest upon his advancement; for his share of the corpus of the property might be taken to pay interest upon his advancement, and thereby absorb it, without any corresponding benefit by way of interest upon the corpus. If, on the other hand, the division of the corpus of the estate is delayed beyond the time when the rights of the parties accrued, and during the delay interest or profit accrue upon the entire corpus, then it would not be proper to divide the interest or profits equally among all entitled, without regard to advancements, or, what would be the same thing, add the interest or profits to the corpus, to constitute the gross fund for distribution, without also charging interest upon the advancement also during the delay. To illustrate: If A die, leaving B and C as his distributees, and a fund of $3,000 for distribution, B, however, having been advanced $1,000, the distribution would be simple. B would be charged with his advancement of $1,000, and receive $1,000 of the corpus, and C the remaining $2,000. If the division be delayed, but without the accumulation of interest, the result would be the same. If, on the other hand, the division be delayed until the corpus of the fund accumulate $1,500 of interest, then to add this to the corpus, and also the advancement without interest, and divide the aggregate equally, would be to give B one half of the interest accrued upon the corpus, and charge him nothing for interest upon his advancement. This would be erroneous. B's share of the corpus was only $1,000. He was entitled to this and the interest that accumulated upon it, which, in the case supposed would be $500; and C to his share of the corpus, and the interest that his share had drawn, which would be $1,000. Precisely the same result would be reached in the case supposed by adding the corpus and interest during the same time into one aggregate, and dividing the same equally. So, in a case of this sort, to charge interest upon the advancement during the delay would reach a correct result. So we see that, in a case where no interest or profits accrue during the delay, there is no difficulty. So, also, where during the delay the corpus of the fund has for the whole time drawn the regular rate of interest, it is equally free from difficulty. But if we suppose cases where the corpus of the property is partly land, partly money, and partly other property, some of which accumulates interest for the whole time or delay, part produces profits for part of the time, but not at the regular rate of interest, and part produces no profit, then the case is not free from difficulty. The theory may be clear enough, but the practical application may be difficult. In the case last supposed, it would not be right to charge interest upon the advancement at the regular rate against the increase upon the corpus of the fund, which was not at the same uniform rate. As we have said, we think the true rule is that the advancements should be equalized out of the principal of the estate, estimated at the time the distribution should have been made, the accumulations upon the principal or corpus during any delay that occurs to be apportioned according to the share of each in the corpus; that is, each one will receive the profits that his share of the principal has accumulated, estimating the profits as having been accumulated upon the whole corpus. The principle is as well stated in White v. White, 3 Dana, 374, as any case to which we have been referred. It is said that in the present case there will be no profits or interest for division; that it has all been absorbed in paying the annuity due the executrix, and other claims. If the account shows this result, then the settlement will be simplified. If otherwise, the rule above indicated should be followed as near as practicable. Absolute equity [equality] in some cases may not be found practicable."

The next case is Rice v. Steger, 3 Tenn. Ch. 328, decided by Judge Cooper in April, 1877. What is there said is really by way of argument, using the rule with regard to advancements in disposing of another question. What is there said, however, is as follows: "The proper mode in which this should be done is to treat the charge as an advancement is treated,—that is, by adding it to the corpus of the estate to be distributed, and deducting it from the share of Robert M. Porter in the fund thus created. If for any reason the distribution be postponed beyond the time when it ought to be made, and in the meantime the corpus of the estate produces interest or profits, the devisees would be entitled to share these accrued profits in the proportion of their respective shares of the original corpus. Burton v. Dickinson, 3 Yerg. 112; McNairy v. McNairy, MSS. Sup. Ct. Dec. Term 1874, cited in the note at the end of the case in 3 Yerg. 2d ed." The note thus referred to figures in subsequent cases, and will now be mentioned. It is as follows: "There is also a suggestion that advancements should be valued at the time they were made, which is undoubtedly correct, and for which this case is cited in House v. Woodard, 5 Coldw. 200. There is also a suggestion that the property of the estate, for the purposes of division, should have been valued as at the death of the intestate, without adding thereto the increase by births, by growth, and the value of their labor; putting this together as a common fund, and dividing it among all the children, deducting the advancements of the shares of such as were advanced. The general idea thus thrown out is correct. The property as it existed at the death of the intestate, with the advancements, constituted the fund for division, and the children were entitled to share in the subsequent increase and profits in the proportion in which they were entitled to share the corpus. The subject was considered, and so adjudged, in McNairy v. McNairy, decided at the December term, 1874, at Nashville." The opinion of McNairy v. McNairy had thus been written before Judge Cooper got out what is known as "Cooper's Edition of the Tennessee Reports," and, of course, before he wrote the note just quoted.

In Grandberry v. Jordan, decided at the December term, 1879, and reported in 3 Tenn. Cas. 267, it is said: "It is undoubtedly true that the property as it existed at the death of the intestate, subject to the claims of creditors and expenses of administration, constituted the fund for division, and the distributees were entitled to share in any subsequent profits in the proportion in which they were entitled to share in the corpus. If, for any reason, the distribution of an estate be postponed beyond the time when it ought to be made, and in the meantime the corpus of the estate produces income or profits, the parties entitled should share those profits in the proportion of their respective shares of the corpus, upon the obvious principle that the law's delay will not be allowed to work any injury to any party. Burton v. Dickinson, 3 Yerg. 112; McNairy v. McNairy (MS.; Dec. term, 1874, at Nashville, since published in 1 Tenn. Cas. 329); Rice v. Steger, 3 Tenn. Ch. 328. If there be no profit, or if the profit be used for specific purposes by agreement of the parties, the reason of the rule fails, and its observance would be a useless form." This opinion was delivered by Judge Cooper.

The next case is Johnson v. Patterson, decided at the September term, 1884, and reported in 13 Lea, 626 et seq. In that case the court used the following language: "The next and last question is as to charging interest on advancements. . . . It is settled by all authority, we believe, that interest is not to be charged before the death of the testator or intestate. See 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 212, and authorities cited. The chancellor charged no interest whatever in his decree. The referees report that interest should be charged on advancements made in the lifetime of the intestate, from time of his death. It was so laid down as a dictum in the case of Burton v. Dickinson, 3 Yerg. 112, and approved in the editor's note, page 122. It was so decided as the general rule in the case of McNairy v. McNairy, (Nashville, Dec. term, 1874) after much consideration, in an able opinion by Judge McFarland. We think this, as a general rule, is correct, as then held, and the referees have correctly reported on this question. It will in most cases produce the desired end, as said in that opinion. There may be cases where it might not reach equality, the leading object of our law in such cases, and then it could be so applied as to produce that result. In this case it will work no injustice as far as we can see; and, if the advancement is not charged with interest from the death of the ancestor, then the party will be getting that much more than an equal share of the estate. She will have to account for it, and have it charged against her at its value when received; and, starting from the death of Andrew Johnson, interest will be calculated on the ascertained value as fixed in this opinion."

In Williams v. Williams (decided at the September term, 1885) 15 Lea, 438, the court used the following language upon the same subject: "The third exception is because the report recommends that interest should be allowed on advancements from death of testator. This is correct as to all money advancements, or property advanced in the lifetime of the testator, with the money value charged against the legatee in the will. See Burton v. Dickinson, 3 Yerg. 122; Johnson v. Patterson, 13 Lea, 657. As to property advancements, the rule is given in Judge Cooper's note to the case in 3 Yerg., approved in McNairy v. McNairy, December, 1874, that the property as it existed at the death of the testator, with the advancements, constitutes the fund for division, and the children are entitled to share in the subsequent increase and profits in the proportion in which they were entitled to the corpus. These rules will serve to guide in the final settlement of this case."

In the case of Roberson v. Nail, decided at the October term, 1886, and reported in 85 Tenn. 124, 2 S. W. 19, it is said: "The rule is to estimate the advancement, if value is fixed, at the time made; if value is not fixed, at actual value. Burton v. Dickinson, 3 Yerg. 112; House v. Woodward, 5 Coldw. 200; Andrews v. Andrews, 7 Heisk. 251. Interest from date of advancement will not be charged (Morris v. Morris, 9 Heisk. 814; Brown v. Dortch, 12 Heisk. 740, 754), but will be charged from the death of the intestate (Johnson v. Patterson, 13 Lea, 657). This error in the decree is probably of no practical importance, as the amounts charged, without interest, will doubtless largely exceed the interest of each of the three children, and upon that basis no surplus would remain for them. . . . The decree will be modified so as to charge the defendants with the $1,000 advanced to each heir by Isaac Roberson, with interest thereon since his death."

The next case is Steele v. Frierson, decided at the December term, 1886, and reported in 85 Tenn., at page 430, 3 S. W. 649. In this case it is said: "There is no doubt of the correctness of the decree of the chancellor in holding that the item of $1,000 paid by the intestate for his son Thomas was an advancement. . . . The chancellor should have allowed interest on this advancement from the date of the testator's death. The report of the master is not excepted to upon the ground that interest is not reported on this advancement. But we do not think it was necessary, because, as matter of law, such advancements bear interest. The question is properly raised by exception to the report of the referees, and the decree of the chancellor and report of referees will be corrected upon this point."

The next case is Moore v. Burrow, decided at the April term, 1890, and reported in 89 Tenn. 101, 17 S. W. 1035. The court there said (page 106, 80 Tenn., and page 1036, 17 S. W.): "Error is also assigned on that part of the decree charging Mrs. McKelvy with interest on advancements from death of her father. On this point the decree is right. The rule is well settled that interest must be computed on advancements, in money or property, from the time the ancestor dies. Johnson v. Patterson, 13 Lea, 632; Williams v. Williams, 15 Lea, 439; Steele v. Frierson, 85 Tenn. 431, 3 S. W. 649. This case presents no ground for an exception to the general rule." In this case it appeared that John J. Burrow had placed his daughter Mrs. McKelvy in possession of land in 1856, the land at that time being worth $3,222. In 1873 he gave to his son George H. Burrow 600 acres of land, subject, however, to an equalization between himself and Mrs. McKelvy. John J. Burrow died in 1887, having used and occupied the 600 acres up to his death. The bill was filed in 1888. As seen, Mrs. McKelvy was charged with interest on the $3,200 from the death of her father.

Since the case of McNairy v. McNairy, the court has not undertaken a general discussion of the subject. That case is the leading one in the state, and, as we have seen, is referred to and relied on in nearly all of the subsequent decisions. From the discussion in that case it is seen that interest is not charged as upon a debt, but merely for the purpose of effecting equality. It is stated in that case, and also in the subsequent case in 13 Lea, which is itself referred to and approved in other cases, in substance, that, if equality can be effected without charging interest at the legal rate, this will be done. The last cases (those in 85 Tenn. 430, 3 S. W. 649, and 89 Tenn. 101, 17 S. W. 1035), however, seem to show that interest will be charged as a matter of law; but in the other last case (Moore v. Burrow, 89 Tenn. 101, 17 S. W. 1035) it should be noted that the court uses this language: "This case presents no ground for exception to the general rule." It should be noted that this case refers to Johnson v. Patterson, 13 Lea, 632, in which it was said (page 657) that, if the charging of interest did not reach equality, then the rule could be so applied as to produce that result. This was evidently the matter of exception to the rule indicated by the opinion just referred to, in Moore v. Burrow.

From the foregoing review, we apprehend that interest should be charged upon advancements, as a matter of law, from the death of the ancestor, as a means of producing equality, unless there is some equitable consideration in the case which will justify an exception. It is insisted by David Rambo, and others in the same interests, that, under the authority of McNairy v. McNairy, no interest should be charged upon advancements unless there was an increase in the corpus of the estate. It is urged that there is no increase here, and that therefore no interest should be allowed upon the advancements. It is said that to allow interest upon these advancements for the time claimed (more than twenty years) would amount practically to a confiscation of the share of David Rambo and others in their father's estate; there being left to them on this basis, only about $60 apiece out of the $1,652. On the other hand, it is said that David Rambo and others have had the enjoyment of their lands for more than twenty years, while M. V. Rambo had nothing. To this it is replied that M. V. Rambo at any time after his father's death could have had the homestead and dower land sold subject to the homestead and dower right, and could have had the proceeds divided, and advancements then settled. To this it is replied, in turn, that it was no more incumbent upon M. V. Rambo to have the land sold and divided, than it was upon his brothers. In view of the condition of our decisions upon the subject, we are in some doubt as to whether we should apply the rule rigidly, or should find an exception in the facts set forth in the finding of facts. It seems inequitable that M. V. Rambo should lie by for more than twenty years, when he could have had a division at any time, and now he, or those owning his interest, come forward at this late day for a division, and demand the payment of interest upon the part of his brothers. At this rate, counting interest for twenty-two years, there would be $660 interest on each of the six shares advanced. Adding this to each of the six shares and the $1,652, the total estate would be $8,612. One seventh would be $1,230, which would go to the M. V. Rambo share, leaving (omitting the costs) $422 for division among the seven, or, say, $60 to the share. That is, stated roughly, out of the money now on hand M. V. Rambo's interest would receive $1,230, and each of the others only about $60. To justify this apparent inequality, our attention is called to the fact that the other heirs have had possession of their lands during all this time, and getting rents and profits thereof. The argument would be a good one, if any reason existed for the postponement of the division until this time; that is, if the situation of the estate had been such, on account of debts or litigation or uncertainty of title, or otherwise, that there could not have been a sale and division. But during the whole twenty-two years there has been no obstacle in the way of M. V. Rambo's enjoyment of his interest, except his own inertia. Such inequality as M. V. Rambo has suffered since his father's death, by the fact that his brothers were in possession of $500 worth of land, and he was in possession of none, was caused merely by his failure to act. It will not do to say that it was as much incumbent upon his brothers as upon him to file a bill and have the reversionary interest sold. He was the only one who occupied an unequal position, and he was called upon first to move, or to bear the consequences. He had not the legal right to lie by twenty-two years, contented with the existing state of things, and then, after this length of time, to claim interest from his brothers on their shares, because of his own inertia. To allow this would be a perversion of the rule. It would be to convert a shield of protection into a sword of oppression. It is true that the cases in 85 Tenn. 430, 3 S. W. 649, and 89 Tenn. 101, 17 S. W. 1035, seem to state the rule, broadly, that interest must be counted, as a matter of law, from the death of the ancestor; but it must be borne in mind that the court did not have before it in those cases any circumstances calling for an exception to the rule, and it must further be borne in mind, as we have already stated, that the court indicates that the rule is subject to exception, and that the leading case upon the subject (McNairy v. McNairy) was not overruled. We are not unaware that McNairy v. McNairy was not at that time published, but it was referred to, and is subsequently stated in the 13 Lea case, and this case was before the court and was cited. We do not think, therefore, that the court intended to lay down an ironclad rule, that, under all circumstances, interest must be counted from the death of the ancestor.

We have considered the question whether we should allow interest to the extent of the difference between the value of the land at the time the homestead and dower were assigned, and at the time the life estate fell in; this difference, as shown in the finding of facts, being $352. This would seem to fall directly within the rule laid down in McNairy v. McNairy. It would seem from the latter case that, wherever there has been an increment to the corpus of the estate, interest should be counted at least to the amount of the increment. It would further seem from that case that interest could be counted in no case other than one in which there had been an increment to the corpus. It is observed, however, under the later cases, that the doctrine has progressed so far as that it is the rule now, in general, to charge interest, without regard to the question of increment. The fundamental thought is that there shall be equality. It is further true, under the doctrine of laches, that, when the inequality has been produced by the negligence of a party who makes his failure the basis of his action, he should not be heard to complain. Now, the cases in 85 Tenn. 430, 3 S.W. 649, and 89 Tenn. 101, 17 S.W. 1035, were instances merely where interest was charged upon the law's delay in effecting a settlement of the estate. It will be observed, from an inspection of those cases, that the suits were tried within a reasonable time. Without doubt, if M. V. Rambo had filed his bill for a sale of the property within a reasonable time, he would have had the right to charge his brothers' interest upon their advancements pending a settlement, from the death of his father. Under the facts stated, we think that a charge of interest during the probable law's delay (say, at that period, two years) would have produced an equitable result. Recurring now to the item of $352, the difference between the value of the land at the time the dower and homestead were assigned, and the time when those estates fell in: This is not, strictly speaking, an increment to the estate, but a mere removal of an encumbrance, and hence the rule of McNairy v. McNairy would not apply. It results that the decree of the chancellor must be modified to the extent of charging on the advancements made by the ancestor interest for the period of two years from the death of such ancestor. In all other respects the decree of the chancellor must be affirmed, with costs of this court and of the court below. Remanded for further proceedings. All the Judges concur.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

BRUSH ELECTRIC LIGHT & POWER COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

E. LEFEVRE and Wife.

(93 Tex. 604.)

1. An exception to the allegations of a petition on the ground of indefiniteness should be sustained where it merely sets out the conclusions of the pleader as to the legal effect of an ordinance prescribing regulations for the suspension of electric wires, and fails to state in terms or in substance the provisions of the ordinance.
2. Failure to insulate electric light wires extending across a street, at and above the point where they were fastened to a wooden awning 16 feet above the level of the street, does not render the electric light company liable for the death of a person by contact therewith while upon the awning for the purpose of raising the wires to permit the passage thereunder of a house which he was engaged in moving, where the awning was not used as a place of resort, and it could not reasonably have been expected that anyone would ever be upon it, and the height at which the wires were strung precluded the possibility of any traveler upon the street coming in contact with them.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the First Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Galveston County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiffs' son. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Terry, Ballinger, Smith, & Lee, for plaintiff in error:

The court of civil appeals erred in holding that, by reason of the negligence of said E.

Lefevre in taking hold of the wires, he was not debarred from recovering for the injuries to his son.

The recovery in behalf of the mother would not belong to her separate estate, because such recovery was not the separate estate of Mrs. Clara Lefevre, but was community property of herself and husband, and she would be equally affected by the negligence of her husband, and not entitled to recover separately.

It was the son's duty, after he had revived his father, knowing their proximity to the dangerous wires, to remove both himself and his father from the place of danger, and not to permit the father or himself to remain in such a position as that the latter, whether consciously or unconsciously, could throw him upon the wires.

The license or permit given to E. Lefevre by the mayor to move the house was of no effect, since no officer of the city could suspend the law, and such permit was absolutely void as being in direct contravention of the ordinance.

If the defendant, exercising the diligence of a reasonably prudent man, in view of all the facts, could not have anticipated the injuries resulting to Paul Lefevre by his father's negligently grasping hold of the wires, and thereafter, and as a result thereof, falling against him in such a manner as to cause his death, no recovery can be had.

Messrs. James B. Stubbs, Charles J. Stubbs, and Edwin S. Easley for defendants in error.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

E. and Clara Lefevre, being husband and wife, sued the plaintiff in error in the district court of Galveston county for damages on account of the death of Paul, charged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the electric light company. The case was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for $1,000 for E. Lefevre, and $3,000 for Clara Lefevre, which judgment was affirmed by the court of civil appeals. It will not be necessary to give a full statement of the facts in this case. The facts necessary to an understanding of the questions decided by us are as follows: Paul Lefevre was killed by coming in contact with the defendant's wires, maintained and operated by it in the city of Galveston, which wires were suspended diagonally across the intersection of Strand and Twenty-First streets, in that city. The wires were fastened upon awnings at the northeast and at the southwest corners of the intersection of said streets. Between these points two wires extended at the height of about 16 feet from the street; and at the northeast corner they were fastened upon a trestle about 2½ feet above the top of the awning in front of the house situated on that corner, and from the top of the trestle they extended down to the awning, and thence into the building, for lighting purposes. The top of the trestle on the awning was about 19 feet, and the top of the awning was about 16 feet, from the level of the street. The wires between the top of the trestle and the awning had been spliced, and were entirely bare, having no insulation upon them. E. Lefevre, assisted by his son and others, was engaged in moving a house along Strand towards the east, and, arriving at the intersection of Strand with Twenty-First street, they found that the wires were hanging too low for the house to pass under them, the top of the house being about 24 feet above the level of the street. E. Lefevre went upon the awning in question, and, having fastened a rope to the wires to lift them above the house, threw it to his son, who was upon the top of the house that was being moved; and E. Lefevre, in order to assist his son, caught hold of the wires, receiving a shock that produced unconsciousness. Paul, seeing the condition of his father, jumped from the top of the house onto the awning, and, with the help of another, released the father from the wires; and, he being restored to consciousness, Paul fell from some cause, and his father fell likewise upon him, on the top of the awning. Paul caught with both of his hands the two wires extending from the trestle to the awning, and received a shock that produced his death. There is no evidence that this awning was ever used as a place of resort, or for any purpose whatever, by persons going upon the top of it; and the photographic views of it, which were in evidence, and are in the statement of facts, indicate that it was simply an awning built for shade and protection to the sidewalk and the front of the house to which it was attached.

We shall discuss but two questions presented by the application: First. Were the allegations of the petition, setting up the ordinance which required the wires to be raised 25 feet above the street, sufficiently definite? Second. Was there any evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff in error which proximately caused the death of Paul Lefevre?

The plaintiffs' petition contains these allegations: "That, in obedience to the ordinances of the said city of Galveston, it is, and was on the day and date above named, the duty of the defendant company to cause all of its electric wires to be suspended, and keep them suspended, at least 25 feet above the grade of the streets, and to cause same to be properly and completely insulated from surface contact; . . . that said wires were not suspended 25 feet above the grade of the streets at said point, but were suspended only about 15 feet, and by reason of this fact it became necessary to lift said wires higher, in order that the house might pass thereunder." The allegations of the petition, as set out, are the conclusions of the pleader upon the legal effect of the ordinance; but the provisions of that ordinance are not alleged, either in terms or in substance, so that the court could, from the plea, determine what was required by it of the electric light company. The special exception interposed by the defendant below to the foregoing allegations of the petition should have been sustained. Austin v. Walton, 68 Tex. 507, 5 S. W. 70.

There can be no liability for the injury in this case unless, from all the circumstances, the electric light company could reasonably expect that some person might be injured by its failure to cover the wires placed by it upon the awning where the deceased received his injury. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Bigham, 90 Tex. 225, 38 S. W. 162. In the case cited, Chief Justice Gaines, on behalf of the court, expressed the rule in the following language; quoting from the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256: "But it is generally held that in order to warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances." This is probably as accurate a statement of the doctrine as can be given, and is substantially that generally laid down by the authorities." Applying this rule to the facts of this case, the inquiry arises: Would an ordinarily prudent man, looking at the surroundings as they then appeared, have reasonably expected that any person would be upon the awning, and might be injured by coming in contact with the exposed wires? If such a consequence might have been reasonably foreseen, then the plaintiff in error would be liable for the injury, under the facts of this case, unless there be some other defense. If not, then it cannot be held liable for the death of Paul Lefevre. If the testimony is such that a jury might have found that the electric light company ought to have anticipated the injury, then this court cannot inquire into the correctness of such a conclusion, although it might differ with the jury as to the correctness of the verdict. In the facts of this case there is not a scintilla of proof that the awning had been used by any person as a place of resort, either for pleasure or for business. Looking at the photographic views of the situation, the awning appears to be such as is common in the towns and cities as a protection to the front of the building, with no railing or other protection upon the top or roof showing the intention for persons to resort there for any purpose whatever. If a man of ordinary prudence had been placing the wires at the same points, the facts would not have notified him that probably someone would be injured by them. From the street and the sidewalk to the place where the exposed wires were located is a distance of about 16 feet, which must have been at least 10 feet above the heads of men of ordinary height passing along the street, and there were no means by which passers upon the street or sidewalk could come in contact with the wire. It was therefore not negligence, with regard to persons traveling along the street or sidewalk, to leave the wire exposed, because there was no reasonable, and scarcely a possible, chance for such persons to be injured thereby. We are of opinion that there is no evidence upon which a jury could base a verdict in favor of the defendants in error, and the trial court erred in refusing to give the requested instruction to find for defendant.

For the error of not sustaining the exception to the plaintiffs' petition, and because there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the electric light company, the judgments of the District Court and Court of Civil Appeals are reversed, and this cause is remanded.

J. D. CRAWFORD.

(93 Tex. 373.)

A sheriff is not protected by a writ of sequestration issued in conformity to law, in the seizure of property which is in the possession of, and owned by, a stranger to the writ.

NOTE.—As to levy on property of stranger to writ, see Dixon v. White Sewing Mach. Co. (Pa.) 5 L. R. A. 659; and Brownell v. Durkee (Wis.) 13 L. R. A. 487.

QUESTIONS certified by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court which arose upon appeal by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Van Zandt County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful seizure of property in plaintiff's possession under a writ commanding the seizure of the property as belonging to B. W. Rose. Answers returned favorable to appellee.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wynne & Smith for appellants.

Messrs. Kearby & Kearby and W. O. Blanks for appellee.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought before us upon certificate from the court of civil appeals of the fifth district, presenting the following statement and question:

"Hufnagel Shoe Co. sued B. W. Rose, and caused a writ of sequestration to issue, directed to the sheriff of Van Zandt county, Texas, in full conformity with our statutes governing the writ of sequestration, commanding him to seize certain specific property, being a lot of shoes. The writ was executed by the sheriff by seizing and taking into his possession said property. At the time of said seizure said property was owned by and in the possession of J. D. Crawford, who was not a party to the suit, and a stranger to the writ. The property was destroyed by fire while in the sheriff's custody. J. D. Crawford brought this suit against the sheriff and his bondsmen to recover the value of the property so seized and taken from his possession.

"Question. Where a sheriff, by virtue of a writ of sequestration, issued in conformity with our statutes, seizes certain specified property named in the writ, said property at the time of seizure being owned by and in possession of a stranger to the writ, is such writ a protection to the sheriff in seizing and taking possession of the property in a suit against him where the stranger seeks to recover damages for such seizure? See Lackey v. Campbell (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 46."

We have been unable to find any decision of this court upon the question certified. But in the case of Maddox v. Tierney, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 396, it was held by the court of appeals that an order of sale issued upon a judgment foreclosing a mortgage upon specific property as against the defendant to the action would not protect the officer in taking such property, if it belonged to and was in possession of another, not a party to the suit in which the judgment was rendered. We think that decision was correct, and that the principle upon which it was based applies equally to the question before us. The writ in general use in other jurisdictions which most closely resembles our writ of sequestration is the writ of replevin. A diversity of opinion has existed among the courts of other states upon the question whether or not that writ will protect an officer who, under its authority, when issued against one party, takes the property described in it from the possession of another, to whom it actually belongs. Some of the courts argue that, since the writ is fair and regular on its face, and commands the officer to seize the property described in it, and he is bound to obey its mandates, he must necessarily be protected in doing so. Boyden v. Frank, 20 Ill. App. 175; Willard v. Kimball, 10 Allen, 211, 87 Am. Dec. 632; Shipman v. Clark, 4 Denio, 446, 47 Am. Dec. 264; Foster v. Pettibone, 20 Barb. 350; Weiner v. Van Rensselaer, 43 N. J. L. 547; Watkins v. Page, 2 Wis. 96; Weinberg v. Conover, 4 Wis. 803. Others hold that, since the writ is issued at the suit of one person against another, for the purpose of recovering the title, or possession, or both, from such other, it does not impart authority to take from the possession of a third person his property. Stimpson v. Reynolds, 14 Barb. 508; State v. Jennings, 14 Ohio St. 73; Davis v. Gambert, 57 Iowa, 239, 10 N. W. 658; West v. Hayes, 120 Ala. 92, 23 So. 727. In many of the decisions first cited the rulings were limited to cases in which the property of the third party was found in and taken from the possession of the defendant in the writ, but the reasoning of the courts would seem to extend as well to cases in which the taking was from the possession of the owner himself. In several of them there are dissenting opinions. The discussions were sometimes called forth in the consideration of the question whether or not one not a party to a writ of replevin, whose property had been seized under it, could himself maintain an independent action of replevin against the officer for its recovery; the courts assuming the question depended upon the other one,—whether or not the writ authorized the taking of the property,—and deciding the cases before them according to their views upon the latter question. Other courts have, however, held, upon different grounds, that the second action of replevin could not be maintained against the officer, the conflict of opinion being even greater on this point than on the other. It seems to us that the proposition affirmed by the authorities first referred to is based upon the mere assumption that the writ obliges the officer to seize the property, whether found in the possession of the defendant in the writ or in that of a third person owning it. We do not believe such to be the scope of the writ of sequestration. It is sued out as an auxiliary writ, merely to preserve the property pending the suit, by which the plaintiff seeks to recover the title or possession of it from the defendant, whose title to hold it is put in issue. The cause of action is stated, and the affidavit made against, and the bond given to secure, only the party sued. While the writ commands the officer to seize the property sued for, it is intended only to enforce the right to its seizure which plaintiff has acquired as against the defendant by complying with the statute. To say that the writ authorizes the sheriff to take the property of another from his possession seems to us equivalent to saying that the plaintiff has the right to such action when he has not taken the steps required by law to entitle him to it. How can it be the duty of the sheriff to make such a seizure unless it is the right of the plaintiff to have him do so? The history of our legislation shows that it was never allowable to take the property of a citizen from his possession without a proper proceeding against him, in which security was given for damages and costs which might result. The 143d section of the act of May 13, 1846, to regulate proceedings in district courts, provided: "That no writ of quia timet, attachment, or any other original writ or process, whereby the property of any citizen of this state shall be ordered to be seized or taken into custody, shall be issued by any civil officer of this state, or by order of any judge of the same, unless the party applying for such writ or process shall first make affidavit in writing of the truth of the matter set forth in his or her petition, and shall file in the clerk's office of the court where the same is to be sued out and entered, a bond with good security, and in a sum at least double the value of the property to be seized and taken, or of the debts and damages claimed to be due; conditioned to pay all costs and damages which the party against whom such writ or process may be sued out shall sustain, by reason of the wrongfully and unjustly suing out of the same; provided, that this section shall not be construed to prevent the issuing of attachments by justices of the peace, under the provisions of any statute authorizing such attachments; and provided also, that it shall not be so construed as to prevent the issuing of any writ or process to compel the attendance of defaulting witnesses or jurors in any court or tribunal to which they may have been legally summoned, or to any writ or process authorized by law in criminal cases." The next section of the statute provides for the issuance of writs of sequestration upon prescribed conditions, and this was amended by the act of 1848, but the requirements of article 143 were left in force. Cheatham v. Riddle, 8 Tex. 165. The plain purpose of these provisions was to require a suit with a verified petition against and a bond to the person whose property was to be seized, before its seizure under any writ was authorized. In the revisions of the laws that have since been made the provisions of article 143 have been distributed, so that its requirements applicable to a particular writ have been embodied in the statute regulating that writ. All of the substantial requirements of that article affecting this question have been carried into the present statute concerning sequestration. While a sworn petition may not be necessary, a suit is required, with an affidavit and bond which would meet the purposes of the former law. The sequestration law requires no bond to secure any person but the defendant. It authorizes the defendant, and no one else in the first instance, to give a replevy bond, and retain the property; and, if he fails to do so, it authorizes the plaintiff to replevy. It provides for a sale of the property, if it be perishable, in case the defendant does not replevy. There is no provision whatever in this state for the protection of the rights of any but the parties to the suit. If it be true that the officer is authorized to invade the possession of a stranger to the action, and take his property, it may be replevied by either party to the suit, or sold as perishable; and, in case of insolvency of the plaintiff, its owner would be left without substantial redress. In our opinion, the statute contemplates no such result. It requires the party desiring to sue for property to bring his action against him who holds it, and to direct his oath against him, and to make his bond payable to him. When he has complied with these requirements, he has entitled himself to a writ to take the property from the defendant for the purposes of preserving it, or securing the fruits of the litigation pending the action; but he has not entitled himself, and therefore cannot require the officer, to take the property of any other person. The officer may protect himself, if he finds the property in the possession of a third party, and is doubtful as to the ownership, by requiring indemnity. Illies v. Fitzgerald, 11 Tex. 417. The statute regulating the trial of the right of property gives to the owner of personal property taken under a writ against another a remedy by which he may regain possession and establish his ownership; but this has never been regarded as depriving him of any remedy given by law to owners of property for the conversion of their goods. It is as applicable in levies under attachments and executions as to those made under sequestrations, and can no more be held exclusive in one case than in the other. It cannot be made available without a bond, and the right of the owner to elect whether he will pursue it or resort to his action for damages against the person who has taken his property is an important one, which may, in many cases, be essential to complete redress. It may be true, also, that a third party may intervene in a sequestration suit involving title to personal property, and have his rights adjudicated; but, if he may do this, he may also maintain a separate action. In any of these proceedings he may fail of complete satisfaction for the wrong done him unless he can hold the officer responsible, while the latter may protect himself in the way indicated. We answer the question in the negative.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

SUPREME COUNCIL CATHOLIC KNIGHTS OF AMERICA, Appt.,

v.

Josephine DENSFORD et al.

(.....Ky.....)

The share of one of the beneficiaries of a benefit certificate, who dies, leaving issue, during the life of the insured, is in the nature of a testamentary gift, and will therefore pass to such issue in accordance with the rule as to a devise or legacy declared by Stat. § 4841, providing that it shall pass to the issue of a devisee or legatee who dies during the life of testator, although a by-law of the society is to the effect that the share of a beneficiary who dies during the life of the insured shall go to the other beneficiaries pro rata, since this must be construed, in the light of the statute, to apply only when the deceased beneficiary leaves no issue.

(March 17, 1900.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Division of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover a share of a benefit certificate issued by defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Newton G. Rogers, for appellant:

The constitution, by-laws, rules, and regulations of the appellant, the Supreme Council, govern its members.

The law of the society provided that the fund "shall be paid in full to the surviving beneficiary or beneficiaries, each sharing pro rata, as provided in the benefit certificate."

Messrs. C. G. Hulsewede and L. A. Douglass, for appellees:

The charter of the appellant company provides that the appellant association is "to establish and maintain a benefit fund, from which a sum not to exceed $2,000 shall be paid, at the death of each member, to his family, or to be disposed of as he may direct."

Under this section of the appellant's charter the only persons who can take are members of the insured's family, as the insured may direct.

Wintergurst directed the insurance to be paid to his three daughters, and never made any further direction in regard to the payment of the same.

The charter prescribes who shall be the beneficiaries of the membership after the death of the member, and it is not in the power of the company, or of the member, or of both, to alter the rights of those who by the charter are declared to be the beneficiaries, except in the mode and to the extent as indicated in said charter.

A life policy for the benefit of the family of the person procuring it is in the nature of a testament, and in construing it the courts should treat it, as far as possible, as a will.

Duvall v. Goodson, 79 Ky. 229; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 42 Conn. 60, 19 Am. Rep. 530; Niblack, Ben. Soc. § 245a.

Barnam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees sought in this suit to recover one third of a benefit certificate for $2,000, issued by the appellant association to their grandfather, Frank Wintergurst. The facts set out in the petition are that he (Wintergurst) became a member of the appellant association, and had the benefit certificate issued upon his life, payable to his three daughters, Emma, Minnie, and Clara Wintergurst; that some time after the issuing of this benefit certificate, and during the life of the insured, his daughter Clara married, had three children, and died before her father, who died several years after her, a member in good standing in appellant association, without having changed the beneficiaries in the certificate taken out by him: and that the three children of Clara are the appellees in this action. Appellant admitted the facts set out in the petition to be as stated, but by the second paragraph of its answer denied liability to appellees growing out of the issuing of the certificate, because of § 173 of its by-laws, which provides as follows: "In the event of the death of one or more of the beneficiaries selected by the member before the decease of such member, if he shall make no further disposition thereof, upon his death such benefit shall be paid in full to the surviving beneficiary or beneficiaries, each sharing pro rata, as provided in the benefit certificate. In the event of the death of all beneficiaries selected by the member before the decease of such member, if he shall make no other or further disposition thereof, the benefit shall be paid to the heirs of the deceased member, and, if no person or persons shall be entitled to receive such benefit by the laws of this order, it shall revert to the sinking fund of the Catholic Knights of America." And appellant alleged that, acting under this by-law, it paid to the surviving beneficiaries, Emma and Minnie Wintergurst, the full amount of the benefit certificate; that it received their receipts therefor, and also the benefit certificate, properly canceled, and that this ended all demands against it. A demurrer was entered to this paragraph of appellant's answer, which was sustained by the chancellor, and, appellant refusing to plead further, the judgment appealed from was entered.

A copy of the benefit certificate, and also of the charter and by-laws of the appellant association, is filed with the answer. Section 2 of their charter provides, among other things, that "the object of the corporation shall be to establish and maintain a benefit fund, from which a sum, not to exceed $2,000, shall be paid at the death of each member, to his family, or be disposed of as he may direct." It is insisted for appellees that the children of the deceased daughter, under appellant's charter, are the surviving beneficiaries of that portion of the insurance money which the policy provided should be paid to their mother, their grandfather never having made any additional direction with reference thereto; and it is also insisted that appellant had no right to establish a by-law naming who should be the beneficiaries of a certificate issued by it, contrary to the provisions of the certificate itself. In the case of Duwall v. Goodson, 79 Ky. 228, this court said: "A life policy for the benefit of the family of the person procuring it, though not a testament, is in the nature of a testament, and in construing it the courts should treat it, as far as possible, as a will, as in doing so they will more nearly approximate the intention of the persons, the destination of whose bounty is involved in such cases. . . . It is not to be supposed that a father, in procuring insurance on his own life for the benefit of his family, or in keeping such a policy alive, intends to benefit himself or his estate." And in the case of Kentucky Masonic Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 13 Bush, 494, it was held that a certificate of membership obligating the company to pay to a member's heirs, or as he may direct in his will, the sum of $—, upon his dying intestate, did not entitle his administrator to recover the fund required by the charter of the company to be paid by the company at his death. In the case of Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 42 Conn. 60, 19 Am. Rep. 530, a wife procured a policy of insurance upon the life of her husband, payable to her if living; if not, to her children. Both she and one of the children died before the husband. The court held that the heirs of the deceased child took by descent its interest, and were entitled to a portion of the amount insured, and in the opinion uses the following language: "This instrument, being testamentary in its nature, should be interpreted by the same rules. Therefore, as in wills of doubtful meaning, one construction being in harmony with the statute and the other contrary to it, preference is given to the former, so this contract should receive an interpretation if possible, which will dispose of the fund according to the law of descent. . . . There is a natural presumption that the party so intended it. When we consider that it was a mother who made this contract and who paid the premiums, we cannot possibly presume that she, had her attention been called to it, and had she known that the child of one of her children would become an orphan before the policy became payable, would intentionally deprive such child of all interest in the policy. Had such been her intention, it would have been easy to express it in unmistakable terms. Had the policy been payable to her 'surviving children,' or to those 'who should be living' at the death of the insured, it would have removed all doubt. But supposing (as she doubtless did) that all of her children would survive, the policy was made payable to them generally. And now a contingency has arisen which manifestly was not contemplated. If the natural presumption cannot be regarded as a legal presumption, and the law, to meet the contingency, is compelled to interpolate in the contract a provision either limiting the payment to the surviving children or including as payee the issue of a deceased child, we think both reason and justice require the latter." The insured, at the time the benefit certificate was taken out, provided that the fund arising therefrom should be payable at his death to his three daughters jointly, manifesting an intention to provide for them equally, and the certificate provides for no other disposition of the fund. If it had been his purpose to provide exclusively for the surviving beneficiaries named in the certificate, it could have been so expressed, or he could have had a new certificate issued after the death of his daughter Clara, payable to the surviving daughters. The mother of appellees, by the terms of this certificate, was vested with a definite interest in the fund, which would be due thereon at the death of her father, and which could only have been defeated by some action on his part making other or different disposition of the part secured to her. As suggested in the Connecticut case quoted above, and also in the two opinions of Judge Cofer, cited supra, a policy of insurance, payable at the death of the insured, is testamentary in its nature, and should be given the construction of a will. Section 4841 of the Kentucky Statutes provides that, "if a devisee or legatee dies before the testator, or is dead at the making of the will, leaving issue who survive the testator, such issue shall take the estate devised or bequeathed, as the devisee or legatee would have done if he had survived the testator, unless a different disposition thereof is made or required by the will;" and this section was a part of the statute law of this state long prior to the taking out of the policy sued on, and, unquestionably, a devise in the exact language of the certificate would be construed to include the children of the dead daughter. See Sheets v. Grubbs, 4 Met. (Ky.) 339; Chenault v. Chenault, 88 Ky. 83, 11 S. W. 424; Thompson v. Myers, 95 Ky. 597, 26 S. W. 1014. It is the duty of courts, as far as practicable, to give effect to the intention of the deviser, and we think it fair to presume that the father believed that under this provision of the statute his grandchildren would inherit the provision made by him for their dead mother. And, under this construction, by-law 173 is not inconsistent with the provision of the charter, the statute law, or adjudications of this court. If the mother of appellees had died childless, then the fund would have gone to the surviving beneficiaries, but, as she left children surviving her, they stand in her shoes, and are entitled to one third of the fund provided for by the certificate.

Hobson, J., concurring:

Frank Wintergurst was a member of the Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America, and held a benefit certificate for $2,000, issued to him upon his life by the association, payable to his three daughters, Emma, Minnie, and Clara. During the life of her father, Clara married, had three children, and died. After this, her father died, a member in good standing, without having changed the beneficiaries in the certificate. The infant children of Clara seek in this action to recover the one third of the $2,000, which, by the certificate, was payable to their mother if she had survived her father.

The first question to be determined is, What effect, under the certificate, had the death of Clara in the lifetime of her father? In Duval v. Goodson, 79 Ky. 228, in determining the rights of the parties in a certificate of membership in the Kentucky Masonic Insurance Company, a similar organization to appellant, this court said: "A life policy for the benefit of the family of the person procuring it, though not a testament, is in the nature of a testament, and in construing it the court should treat it, as far as possible, as a will, as in so doing they will more nearly approximate the intention of the person, the destination of whose bounty is involved in such cases." The same principles were announced in the case of Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 42 Conn. 60, 19 Am. Rep. 530, where the court said: "This instrument, being testamentary in its nature, should be interpreted by the same rules." These cases are cited with approval in 1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 255, and a number of other authorities are referred to as sustaining this rule, which seems to us a sound one. The question presented is, therefore, What is the proper construction of the certificate in this case, if it be construed as a will? Section 2064 of the Kentucky Statutes provides: "When a devise is made to several as a class, or as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, and one or more of the devisees shall die before the testator and another or others shall survive the testator, the share or shares of such as so died shall go to his or their descendants, if any; if none, to the surviving devisees, unless a different disposition is made by the deviser." Section 4841, Id., also provides: "If a devisee or legatee dies before the testator, or is dead at the making of the will, leaving issue who survive the testator, such issue shall take the estate devised or bequeathed as the devisee or legatee would have done if he had survived the testator, unless a different disposition thereof is made or required by the will." These statutes changed the common-law rule, and, under them, if the certificate be construed as a will, the children of Clara take their mother's interest, just as she would have done if living at her father's death. Fuller v. Martin, 96 Ky. 500, 29 S. W. 315. 49 L. R. A.

We are aware that there are a number of decisions holding that upon the death of a beneficiary in the life of the member without some further designation of a beneficiary by him, the benefit lapses, and is not to be paid by the association at all. 1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 243. But these decisions rest upon the common-law rule, which was abrogated in this state by the statute we have quoted.

But it is insisted that appellees are not entitled to recover by reason of the following by-law made by the association: "In the event of the death of one or more of the beneficiaries selected by the member before the decease of such member, if he shall make no further disposition thereof, upon his death such benefit shall be paid in full to the surviving beneficiary or beneficiaries, each sharing pro rata, as provided in the benefit certificate. In the event of the death of all beneficiaries selected by the member before the decease of such member, if he shall make no other or further disposition thereof, the benefit shall be paid to the heirs of the deceased member; and, if no person or persons shall be entitled to receive such benefit by the laws of this order, it shall revert to the sinking fund of the Catholic Knights of America." This by-law was, no doubt, made in view of the rule declared in the decisions referred to above, to prevent the lapsing of the benefit in case of the death of the beneficiary in the lifetime of the member, where he had failed to make any other disposition of the fund. In so far as the by-law operated upon money which would otherwise belong to the association, it would be clearly valid, for the association plainly had the right by its by-laws to dispose of a fund that would otherwise revert to it. In doing this it would invade the rights of no third persons. But if the benefit, on the death of the beneficiary, went to his children, and not to the association, the power of the association to take from the children a right which the law vested in them cannot exist, unless conferred by the charter. The charter is the fountain of authority for the corporation. One who asserts a claim to money due from a corporation occupies a very different position from one who presents a question of policy of the order of which he belongs. Associations like appellant, in matters of this sort, are governed by the same rule as other insurance companies. 1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. §§ 48, 61a, 78. "The prime essential of a valid by-law is that it be consistent with the charter or articles of the association. . . . By-laws in contravention of the provisions of a charter are void." Id. § 83. The charter of this association confers on it no power to control or direct how or to whom the benefit shall be paid at the death of the member. The only provision on this subject is: "The object of the corporation shall be to establish and maintain a benefit fund, from which a sum not to exceed $2,000.00 shall be paid at the death of each member to his family, or be disposed of as he may direct." In Kentucky Masonic Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 13 Bush, 494, this court said: "The charter prescribes who may become members of the company, and their obligation, and who shall be the beneficiaries of the membership after the death of the member, and it is not in the power of the company, or of the member, or of both, to alter the rights of those who, by the charter, are declared to be the beneficiaries, except in the mode and to the extent therein indicated." This ruling was approved in the subsequent case of Duvall v. Goodson, 79 Ky. 220; and in Van Bibber v. Van Bibber, 82 Ky. 350, the court further said: "It is a general rule, as to an ordinary life insurance policy, that the person originally designated in it as the beneficiary is entitled to the benefit, that the right to it vests in him the moment it is issued, and that neither the insured nor the insurer can change it to the detriment of this third party. This rule applies to policies issued by mutual benefit associations, and must govern in this instance, unless the charter provides differently. The certificate of membership constitutes the contract, but it is to be construed and governed by the company's charter." The charter in the case before us conferred upon the member and the member alone the power to direct how his benefit fund should be disposed of. He might have made it, but no such power was conferred on the corporation. The necessary legal inference from the words of an instrument is of as much force as if stated in express terms. If, in this case, the member had stated in the certificate that, if either of his daughters died, her part of the fund should go to her children, if any, the legal effect of the instrument would have been just the same as it now is. If he had so stated in the certificate, a by-law of the association could not have defeated this disposition made by him, and it is equally ineffectual on the certificate as it stands; for this is what he did say in legal effect. When a member disposes of a fund, the law of the land must determine the legal effect of the words he uses, and not the by-laws of the corporation, where, by the charter, it is not allowed to regulate the subject in any way. If it can, by a by-law, abrogate the legal effect of the instrument, why may it not abrogate its express terms by adding other conditions not expressed therein,—as that, if the beneficiaries become infidels, or are convicted of felony, they shall lose all interest in the fund? There is no middle ground. The words of an instrument are no more sacred than its legal effect, and, when the certificate is not enforced according to its real meaning, the power to dispose of the fund which the charter vests in the member is pro tanto taken from him. It is true that a member is presumed to know the by-laws of the association, and is bound by them. But this rule only applies to valid by-laws. If a by-law is void for want of power in the association to make it, it is a nullity, and the member may ignore it. When he had disposed of the fund in words to which the law gave the legal effect he desired, he was not bound to make a further disposition of it to avoid a nullity. The association could, under the charter, put no such onus upon him. He might have disposed of this fund by will, if he had seen fit to do so. If he had disposed of it by will, that disposition of it would have been no less free from modification by the association than his disposition of it by the certificate before us. When he had disposed of it by the acceptance of the certificate, his daughters took an interest which could only be defeated, under the charter, by his making some other disposition of it in his lifetime. When he failed to do this, Clara's children, at her death, took, by virtue of the statute quoted, all the rights their mother would have had if living. If the by-law was intended to change the disposition of the benefit fund made by the member, and gave it a different effect from that the law gave it, it was simply an attempt on the part of the association to regulate a matter over which, under the charter, it had no jurisdiction. For these reasons, I am of opinion that under either construction of the by-law, the judgment of the chancellor is right, and should be affirmed.

Du Relle, J., dissenting (filed March 29, 1900):

The object of the appellant corporation, as by its charter provided, is to unite fraternally all acceptable Catholics, etc.; to establish "and maintain a benefit fund from which a sum not to exceed $2,000 shall be paid at the death of each member to his family, or be disposed of as he may direct," etc. By § 6 of the constitution adopted by the order the object is stated to be: "To establish a benefit fund, from which, on satisfactory evidence of the death of a beneficiary member of the order, a sum not exceeding $2,000 shall be paid as he may have directed in his benefit certificate," etc. By § 107 of the constitution it is required that "the name or names of the person or persons to whom the benefit is to be paid, as directed by the member, shall appear on the application." The benefit certificate is, by § 37, required to be "made payable as the member may have directed in his application," etc. By § 172 of the constitution, "a member may at any time, when in good standing, change his beneficiary upon complying with the requirements hereinafter provided, and upon surrender of his benefit certificate and payment of a fee of $1.00." By § 173 it is provided that, "in the event of the death of one or more of the beneficiaries selected by the member before the decease of such member, if he shall make no further disposition thereof, upon his death such benefit shall be paid in full to the surviving beneficiary or beneficiaries, each sharing pro rata, as provided in the benefit certificate." By the benefit certificate, or contract of insurance, the appellant agrees "to pay to Emma Wintergurst, Minnie Wintergurst, and Clara Wintergurst, the beneficiary designated by said assured in his application, upon due proof of the death of said assured, he being in good standing in the order, the sum of $2,000." After a provision for surrender of the certificate and substitution of another beneficiary or beneficiaries, if the assured so desires, by complying with the laws of the order, follows this provision: "And it is expressly understood that this is a contract between the Supreme Council of the Catholic Knights of America and assured alone, and not a contract between said council and the beneficiaries herein named." The provisions of the constitution adopted by the order, if not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the state, are binding upon the members. Whether called by the name of constitution or by-laws, they have been appropriately described as "the law unto the members." Supreme Commandery K. of G. R. v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 46 Am. Rep. 332. This company was, by its charter, authorized to organize subordinate branches—of one of which the assured in this case was a member—"as it may see fit, under such laws, rules, and regulations as the corporation may enact, not in conflict with the laws of this state and of the United States." "The contract of membership in a mutual association is always made with reference to, and always includes, the constitution and by-laws, of which every member is bound to take notice, whether they are specially referred to in the contract or not, and whether or not they are in fact known to the member." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1081. "Members are presumed to have notice of, and are bound by, all the valid rules and laws of the association affecting their rights or interests. It is their duty to inform themselves, and they cannot, by reason of a lack of knowledge, escape the operation of such rules and laws." Bliss, Ins. § 463; May, Ins. § 552. Abundant authority upon this proposition can be found in almost every state of the Union. Under the charter, the assured had the right to name the beneficiary or beneficiaries. He did so. He was required to state the name or names of the beneficiary or beneficiaries in his application. He did so. These names were copied into the contract, called a "benefit certificate," and when he entered into that contract it was to be read and should be now construed, as if there had been written in it the provisions of the constitution which I have quoted; i. e. that if any one of the beneficiaries, whose names he was required to state, and whose names were written in the certificate, should die before the assured, the benefit should be paid to the surviving beneficiary or beneficiaries. What beneficiaries? As matter of course, and by every rule of fair construction, the beneficiaries that had been spoken of before,—the beneficiaries named in the benefit certificate,—the only beneficiaries spoken of anywhere in the contract, or in the constitution, which forms a component part of it. But in the opinion of a majority of the court it is claimed that "beneficiaries selected by the member," as used in § 173, means something different from what it means in other places in the constitution, and, at all events that where that section provides that on the death of one or more of the beneficiaries selected by the member before the decease of such member, if he shall make no further disposition thereof, upon his death such benefit shall be paid in full to the surviving beneficiary or beneficiaries, the words "surviving beneficiary or beneficiaries"—who are to share pro rata—do not mean those who had been selected by the member, and who did not die before him, but mean the children, sisters, cousins, aunts, or other relatives of the dead beneficiary selected by the member, who may stand to such dead beneficiary in the relation of his heirs at law.

In the separate concurring opinion of a minority of the majority of the court it is maintained that § 173 of the constitution is invalid, because, it is urged, it takes from the member the right of selection of the beneficiary of the benefit certificate secured to him by the charter in the words, "or be disposed of as he may direct." Let us examine this contention a little. As we have seen, when he makes the contract he agrees to the constitution. If, with this provision of the constitution written into the contract, the member still has the absolute right to direct to whom the benefit shall go at his death, then this section is not in conflict with the charter, and is valid, and is a part of the contract. With the section written into the contract, the member may provide to whom the benefit shall go by simply stating to whom he wishes it to go. He may provide limitation over after limitation over, so long as he does not violate the rule as to perpetuities; or, he may name a number of beneficiaries, and may say (as he did in this case when he signed the contract into which is written § 173 of the constitution): "If any of the persons I have named as beneficiaries shall die before me, the survivor or survivors of those I have named shall take. In the event they shall all die before me, the benefit shall go to my heirs at law; and, should I have no heirs at law, it shall go to the society." This could have been written ipsisimis verbis in the benefit certificate. How, then, if, by implication of the constitution into the contract, he did what he had a right to do in express words, was his power to name his beneficiary limited, or taken from him? Such constructions are a perversion of good plain language. No such question as this was presented in any of the Kentucky cases cited in the two opinions of the majority. The circumstances of this case, so far as they appear, are such as appeal to the sympathies. Three children, under twenty-one, are, by the terms of the contract, prevented from taking the share of their grandfather's bounty, which their mother would have taken had she survived him. But we do not know all the circumstances. We do not know whether their father is not richer than both their aunts. We do not know whether they are not amply provided for otherwise. The facts as to these matters are not before us, and could not properly be brought before us in this case. Speculation as to whether the language of a contract may work a hardship should not influence its construction. For the reasons stated, I dissent from the opinions filed by the majority of the court.

Guffy and White, JJ., concur in this dissent.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Re Petition of John B. TUTHILL et al., for Appointment of Commissioners to Drain Lands in Orange County.

(163 N. Y. 133.)

1. The drainage of agricultural lands by "necessary drains, ditches, and dykes, upon the lands of others, under proper restrictions, and upon just compensation," for which provision may be made by general laws under the amendment of Const. art. 1, § 7, adopted in 1894, is a taking of private property for a private use, in violation of U. S. Const. 14th Amend., prohibiting a state from depriving any person of his property without due process of law. [Per Gray, J.]
2. The assessment of the expense of constructing a drain upon other landowners deemed benefited thereby, as well as upon the petitioner, for which provision is made by Laws 1895, chap. 384, permitting an owner of agricultural lands to institute proceedings for the drainage of such lands or the protection thereof from overflow by the construction of drains or dykes upon the lands of other persons, is not authorized by Const. art. 1, § 7, providing for the passage of general laws for the construction of such drains and dykes, since the Constitution contemplates that the expense shall be borne by the petitioner.

NOTE.—Drainage of private lands as public purpose for which power of eminent domain may be exercised.

It is settled that the power of eminent domain may be employed to effect the drainage and reclamation of lands so far as such drainage is for a public purpose.

Land may be taken by a municipal corporation under the power of eminent domain, which, because of its low and wet condition, constitutes a nuisance, for the purpose of being filled up so as to abate the nuisance. Sweet v. Rechel, 159 U. S. 380, 40 L. ed. 188, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48; Dingley v. Boston, 100 Mass. 544.

The drainage of land, when conducive to the public health, and resulting necessarily in the public convenience and welfare, comes within the scope of legitimate legislative action, and may rightfully call into exercise the power of eminent domain. Duke v. O'Bryan, 100 Ky. 710, 39 S. W. 444, 824.

If lands are swamp, marsh, or wet, disease may be engendered, and the public health may require that they shall be drained, and, if necessary such drain may be constructed through the lands of others. Fleming v. Hull, 73 Iowa, 598, 35 N. W. 673.

The history of the drainage legislation in this state confirms this view of the act.

Taking private property for a drainage ditch may be authorized when necessary for the public welfare. Thompson v. Wood County Treasurer, 11 Ohio St. 678.

Under power of eminent domain the taking must be for a public purpose.

To justify the exercise of the power of eminent domain the taking must be for a public purpose. Under this rule, it is generally held that such power cannot be exercised for procuring a right of way for a drainage ditch, where the ditch is solely for private benefit.

Taking the property of one man and giving it to another is not making a law or rule of action; it is not legislation, it is simply robbery. Coster v. Tide-Water Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 54.

A statute providing that any person who may desire to do so may drain his land through that of another provides for a taking of private property for a private use, and is unconstitutional. Fleming v. Hull, 73 Iowa, 598, 35 N. W. 673.

A drainage law, in so far as it authorizes the construction of such improvement because of private benefits solely, is violative of the spirit of a constitution which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation. *Duke v. A ditch cannot be constructed over the land of another person without his consent merely for the benefit of adjoining land. Gilbert v. Foote, cited in 5 Barb. 474, 483.

A statute cannot be upheld which authorizes the taking of a right of way over land for a drain when demanded by private interest merely, without reference to the public interest, convenience, or welfare. Reeves v. Wood County Treasurer, 8 Ohio St. 333.

A drainage statute the object of which is merely to improve the property of individuals is void, although it provides for compensation to the owner of the land across which the ditch runs. Woodruff v. Fisher, 17 Barb. 224.

The mere fact that larger and better crops will be raised on two farms sought to be drained does not authorize the establishment of a ditch. McQuillen v. Hatton, 42 Ohio St. 202.

A statute authorizing drains for agricultural, sanitary, or mining purposes, without requiring it to be necessary or desirable to promote any public interest, convenience, or welfare, is not valid. The court says no doubt such an improvement may be useful to some, or perhaps many, private owners of land by way of increasing the usefulness and value of their lands. But that is merely a private advantage. It interests the public only indirectly or remotely in the same way and sense in which the public interest is advanced by the thrift and prosperity of individual citizens. Some home or homes might be made more cheerful and healthful. But one man's property cannot be taken to make another man's home more cheerful or healthful. It is only when it will make the homes of the public more healthful, that any man's property can be taken for sanitary purposes. Re Theresa Drainage Dist. 90 Wis. 301, 63 N. W. 288.

But if the principal object intended by the statute is the public welfare, the statute will not be rendered void by the promotion of private interests as incidental thereto. Sessions v. Crunkilton, 20 Ohio St. 349; State ex rel. Holtz v. Henry County Comrs. 41 Ohio St. 423.

In Sherman v. Tobey, 3 Allen, 7, the court, without considering its constitutionality, construed a statute which provided for the draining of wet private lands over the land of adjacent owners.

The taking of property authorized by the Indiana drainage laws is for a public, and not for a private, use. Poundstone v. Baldwin, 145 Ind. 139, 44 N. E. 191.

In Chambers v. Kyle, 67 Ind. 206, the court, in speaking of the drainage law of 1867, says it has uniformly been held that a ditch cannot be established under it without proof made that it is of public utility.

The Indiana act of 1875 provided that a proceeding for the construction of a drain could not be maintained unless it was shown that it would be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare, or that the same would be of public benefit or utility. *McKinsey v. Under the act of 1881, it must appear that the public health will be improved, or one or more public highways of the county or streets of a town or city will be benefited, by the proposed drainage, or the proposed work will be of public utility. Ross v. Davis, 97 Ind. 79.

Under the Wisconsin statute, authority is conferred to lay out drains only where they are demanded by, or will conduce to, the public health or welfare. State ex rel. Witte v. Curtis, 86 Wis. 140, 56 N. W. 475.

Necessity must exist.

In addition to the requirement that the drain must be for a public purpose, it must also be necessary. For if the object can be effected practically as well in some other way private property cannot be seized for the right of way.

Under the Ohio statutes, before the ditch can be located, it must be found necessary, as well as conducive to the public health, convenience, and welfare. Rice v. Wellman, 5 Ohio C. C. 334; Caldwell v. Harrison Twp. 2 Ohio C. C. 10.

Private property can only be taken under a statute providing for the drainage of water from highways when a necessity for such drainage appears. Private property can only be condemned for public use. The public will not be benefited by the ditch if no necessity exists for draining the water from the highway, which belongs to the public. Chaplin v. Wheatland Highway Comrs. 129 Ill. 651, 22 N. E. 484.

One of the jurisdictional facts under the Nebraska statutes is that the drain is necessary, and will be conducive to the health, conveni-

It has been held, however, that the ditch need not be absolutely necessary to the public, but it will be sufficient if it is essentially requisite. Fleming*, 82 Ind. 117; Blissard v. Riley, 83 Ind. 300.

Unless a general law for the drainage of wet lands makes proper provision for the determination in each proceeding of the question whether the particular ditch or system of drainage will be of public utility or promote the public health, welfare, and convenience, it will be unconstitutional and void. Gifford Drainage Dist. v. Shroer, 145 Ind. 572, 44 N. E. 636.

What is a public purpose?

There has been some difference of opinion as to what is a public purpose. Some courts have held that to make the purpose public the drain must be necessary to preserve the public health. Other courts have regarded the reclamation of large tracts of land sufficient to make the purpose public, while still others have held that there was no difference in principle between the reclamation of large and small tracts of land; so that, if the exercise of the power is justifiable for any reclamation, it is justified for all. Other courts still have found a public purpose in subserving the public convenience or welfare, as by preserving highways.

Public health.

Drainage laws which take from the citizen his private property against his will can be upheld only upon the ground that such drains are necessary for the public health. They proceed upon the basis that low, wet, and marsh lands generate malaria, causing sickness and danger to the health and life of the people; that when they are of such character as to injure the health of the community they become, and are, public nuisances which ought to be abated, and the legislature have the right, under the police power inherent in the government, to protect the people from plague and pestilence, and to preserve the public health. But drainage for the purpose of private advantages, such as improving the quality of the land, or rendering it more productive or fit for cultivation, cannot be justified under the police power. Neither public convenience nor public welfare, independent of considerations of the public health, will justify the legislature in the enactment of laws for the construction of drains. Kinnie v. Bare, 68 Mich. 625, 36 N. W. 672.

Private property cannot be taken for a right of way for a drainage ditch unless it is found that the lands to be drained are a source of disease, and that the draining of them will promote the public health. Hull v. Baird, 73 Iowa, 528, 35 N. W. 618.

A drainage law authorizing the taking of private property for a right of way for a ditch can be sustained only upon the ground that it serves to preserve or promote the public health. Re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 88; Burk v. Ayers, 19 Hun, 17; Catlin v. Munn, 37 Hun, 23; Re Drainage in Penfield, 8 App. Div. 80, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1056.

The benefit of the public health is a necessary element of a valid drainage law by which the power of eminent domain is authorized to be exercised. Re Draining in Chili, 5 Hun, 116.

The drainage of a swamp is a public purpose for which the right of eminent domain may be exercised. Hartwell v. Armstrong, 19 Barb. 166.

Reclamation of large tracts.

In Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417, which involved the validity of a statute providing for the removal of a dam to relieve property bordering on certain rivers from the water thrown back on them by the dam, the court says, in the present case there can be no doubt that every owner of meadow land bordering on these rivers will be greatly benefited to a greater or less extent by the reduction of the height of the dam. The act is therefore in a certain sense for a private use, and inures to the individual advantage of such owners. But this is by no means a decisive test of its validity. Many enterprises of the highest public utility are productive of great and immediate benefits to individuals. We are to look further into the probable operation and effect of the statute in question, in order to ascertain whether some public interest or benefit may not be likely to accrue from the execution of the power conferred upon the commissioners. If any such can be found, we are bound to suppose that the act was passed in order to effect it. The improvement of a large tract of territory situated in several towns and owned by a great number of persons, by draining off the water and thereby rendering the land suitable for tillage, which could not otherwise be usefully improved at all, would seem to come fairly within the scope of legislative action, and not to be so devoid of public utility and advantage as to make it the duty of the court to pronounce a statute, which might well be designed to effect such a purpose, invalid and unconstitutional. The act would stand on different grounds if it appeared that only very few individuals, or a small adjacent territory, were to be benefited by the taking of private property. The advantages which may result from the removal of the obstruction are not local in their nature, nor intended to be confined to a single neighborhood. They are designed to embrace a large section of land lying in one of the most populous and highly cultivated counties of the state, and by increasing the productive capacity of the soil to confer a benefit, not only on the owners of the meadows, but on all those who will receive the incidental advantage arising from the development of the agricultural resources of so extensive a territory.

The act may be sustained on the ground that it is a proper exercise "of the power of the legislature to establish regulations by which adjoining lands held by various owners in severalty, and in the improvement of which all have a common interest, but, which, by reason of the peculiar natural condition of the whole tract, cannot be improved or enjoyed by any of them without the concurrence of all, may be reclaimed and made useful to all at their joint expense."

For the purpose of reclaiming large tracts of land the right of eminent domain may be employed. Tide-Water Co. v. Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 518, 90 Am. Dec. 634.

If draining of large swamps would add largely to the area of valuable lands in the state, and increase its resources, private property may be taken for that purpose. Millions of acres of such land have been redeemed, and there is no question but what the legislature has this authority which has been sanctioned by the usage of the whole civilised world. Batchelder v. Hibbard, 58 N. H. 269.

An act for the drainage of thousands of acres of land lying in a low portion of the state must be deemed of general and public utility. The right of the state to condemn lands for drains rests on the same foundation as its right in case of public roads, mills, railroads, causeways, schoolhouses, forts, lighthouses, etc. Nordfleet v. Cromwell, 70 N. C. 634, 18 Am. Rep. 787.

The purpose of draining large districts of land lying within several counties of the state, embracing thousands of acres, is sufficiently public to justify the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Re Drainage between Lower Chatham and Little Falls, 35 N. When it is proposed to take private property, either by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or the power of taxation, it is always a question which the citizen whose property is to be taken has the right of wet lands, it will be of public utility and benefit. Zigler v. Menges, 121 Ind. 99, 22 N. E. 782.

The New Jersey court has referred the right to reclaim the land to an authority more ancient than the provisions of the constitutions for the exercise of the right of eminent domain. It says: To effect the object of drainage of a tract of land the statutes provide that the works to effect the drainage may be located in any part of the lands drained, paying the owner of the land thus occupied compensation for the damage by such use. So far private property is taken by them; further it is not. In none of them is the owner divested of his fee. To effect such common drainage, power is in some cases given to continue the drains through adjacent lands, not drained, upon compensation. All this is an ancient and well-known exercise of the legislative power, and may well be considered as included in a grant of legislative power in the Constitution. Beyond this, private property cannot be taken for private uses, even with compensation. Coster v. Tide-Water Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 54.

For all drainage purposes.

Some of the courts have not been content to limit the right in cases involving only the reclamation of land, to the drainage of large tracts, but have held that the power may be exercised in all cases of drainage.

If the general assembly has power to make regulations for draining a swamp containing 10,000 acres, it has the same power in regard to a swamp containing 1,000 acres; so of 100 acres or of 1 acre. There is no distinction in the principle; the only difference is in regard to the degree. Such drainage may be provided for under the police power. The two powers of eminent domain and police regulation are distinct. By the one, property of A is given to B. By the other the property of A is left in him, but is made subservient to the general welfare. The power of the general assembly to make the land of A subservient to the land of B for the purpose of drainage must be yielded upon the authorities and upon the reason of the thing. Pool v. Trexler, 76 N. C. 287.

In Ellinghouse v. Taylor, 19 Mont. 463, 48 Pac. 757, the court, in considering the validity of a law providing for the condemnation of a right of way for an irrigation ditch, says: What real distinction is there, so far as the term "public use" is concerned, between the benefit that results to a state from the reclamation by artificial irrigation of 160 acres of agri-to submit to the court, whether the purpose is a public one.

Under the amendment to the Constitution and the statute, an attempt has been made to authorize the taking of private property for a use not public, but strictly private, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. The right of eminent domain is one residing in the state, which can be used only for public purposes; and any attempt to exercise that right for any other than a public purpose violates the Constitution of the United States.

U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10, U. S. Const. Amend. arts. 5, 14; Cooley, Const. Lim. p.

cultural land owned by one or two persons, and the reclamation by the same means of thousands of acres owned by many different persons living together in one subdivision of the state? We do not think there is any in principle. The reclamation of one small field by means of artificial irrigation promotes the development, and adds to the taxable wealth, of the state, as well as the reclamation by the same means of a number of fields. This ruling was made under a constitution which provides that the purpose of irrigating lands shall be a public use.

The construction of ditches for the drainage of land otherwise useless for agricultural purposes is a public use. And it is not necessary that the public at large shall be benefited, but only that part of the public affected by want of proper drainage, or by the improvement to be made. The public has an interest beyond that of the mere sanitary condition of the land, founded upon other and different principles than the controlling or abatement of nuisances, where any considerable number of persons are concerned, or a tract of land is useless. Lewis County v. Gordon, 20 Wash. 80, 54 Pac. 779.

When the New York Constitution was changed a provision for drainage was inserted which would seem to require an abandonment of the old rule in force in that state, that private property could be taken only when the drainage was necessary for public health. The lower court, in the case of Re Tuthill, 36 App. Div. 492, 55 N. Y. Supp. 657, deals with the question as follows: The Constitution of 1894 provided that general laws may be passed permitting the owners of agricultural land to construct and maintain for the drainage thereof necessary drains, ditches, and dikes upon the land of others with just compensation. Of this provision the court says: If the effect of this provision is to authorize the appropriation of the land of one man, and the application of it to the private use of another, then it is void. All of the authorities of all jurisdictions agree that no necessity, however great, can authorize the legislature to take the property of one man and give it to another with or without compensation. An organic law which grants the exercise of such power is void by the provisions of the Federal Constitution as depriving the citizen of his property without due process of law. Under the operation of that provision, we may no longer assert that the drainage of swamp lands may not be had, unless it be justified as a measure to preserve the public health, and we become bound to justify it, and not only to justify it, but to accept it, as it is the voice of sovereign authority. It may be justified upon the ground that the reclamation of land for purposes of agriculture and habitation is a public purpose. It is not at all certain that the authority may not be supported under the exercise of the police power. It was not within the fair purport of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution that it should prevent this class of legislation. If the authority is sought to be exercised by the individual owner, his position would come squarely within the principle which supports the exercise of the right in respect to the private right of way; that is, it rests upon the ground ex necessitate, and is founded in the public policy of the state. The right of the citizen to enjoy the use of his lands, to bring them under cultivation, and to distribute the product of his land among people generally, is, to a limited extent, a matter in which the general public have an interest. This, when coupled with the performance of those duties which the law devolves upon him as a citizen of the state, makes the exercise of the right a matter of public benefit and utility, sufficient to support the authority which underlies the exercise of the right. The principle of Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 41 L. ed. 869, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56, with reference to the irrigation of land, would seem to authorize the exercise of the power of eminent domain in a case where a considerable tract of land may be reclaimed, as there the public good would be conserved, and it might authorize its application to a small tract, where the necessity was urgent, and a considerable body of people would be favorably affected thereby. Landowners may need places of habitation or the products of the land for their comfort and prosperity, which may be denied in whole or in part if the improvement cannot be made, so that the principle applies. As the proceeding before it, however, involved the question of taxation, rather than that of eminent domain, the court held that the statute was ineffectual because it authorized the exercise of the taxing power in favor of a single person for the improvement of a single acre of agricultural land, a result which was held not to be within the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution.

The adoption of the rule that the power of eminent domain may be exercised for the drainage of small tracts of land would seem to be subversive of the rule that private property cannot be taken for private use, because, although the prosperity of individuals may conduce to the welfare of the state, it has never been considered in other connections that the promotion of individual prosperity was of sufficient importance to call in the aid of the power of hawk & H. Rivers R. Co. 18 Wend. 9, 31 Am. Dec. 313.

The Federal Constitution is of paramount authority upon all subjects with which it deals. The Constitutions of the states, as well as their statutes, are invalid when found to be in conflict with its provisions.

R. A. 490, 51 N. E. 275.

The authority to make these assessments is void as against the Federal Constitution, eminent domain. The Ohio court has held that the prosperity of each individual conduces in a certain sense to the public welfare, but this fact is not a sufficient reason for taking other private property to increase the prosperity of individual men. McQuillen v. Hatton, 42 Ohio St. 202.

Some of the courts which have upheld private drainage laws have felt the force of this objection, and have sought to uphold the laws as an exercise of police power.

The legislature, in the exercise of the police power, has authority to enact drainage laws with a view to the promotion of the general welfare, and the mere fact that one or more individuals may derive from it pecuniary and particular benefits and advantages does not destroy its validity. Winslow v. Winslow, 95 N. C. 24.

The construction of drains demanded by, or which will conduce to, the public health or welfare is within the police power of the state. Donnelly v. Decker, 58 Wis. 461, 46 Am. Rep. 637, 17 N. W. 389; State ex rel. Baltzell v. Stewart, 74 Wis. 620, 6 L. R. A. 394, 48 N. W. 947; State ex rel. Gordon v. McNay, 90 Wis. 104, 62 N. W. 917.

In Donnelly v. Decker, 58 Wis. 461, 46 Am. Rep. 637, 17 N. W. 389, the court says it requires but a casual examination of the statutes for the draining of swamp and overflowed lands to be apparent that such ditching and draining are for no public use whatever within the legal meaning of the term. The primary object is solely to restore such lands to a proper condition for tillage and agriculture by the several owners and for their use alone. It enhances their value, intrinsic and market. This is the only object which concerns their use, and that use is strictly private. This legislation may be referred to the police power by providing for the public health. If it were not for this purpose of the law it would not be endured for a moment, because it would provide for a despotic and most unlawful interference with private property for strictly private purposes and uses, in which neither the people of the state, nor the state itself, nor the public have any interest whatever. It seems marvelous that any court should ever attempt to justify such laws, which are merely and essentially for private purposes, confined to the owners of the lands drained and improved, under the power of eminent domain.

laws does not seem to make the foundation much more substantial. If the public health or welfare is involved the drainage may perhaps be referred to either power. As said by the Arkansas court, where the express object of the taking is the public welfare, the power to take land is referable to the eminent domain or to the police power. Cribbs v. Benedict, 64 Ark. 555, 44 S. W. 707.

But where the matter involved is merely the drainage of a private farm, which is not necessary to the public health, the branch of police power resting on the preservation of the public health is not involved; and if the drainage of a private farm is not sufficiently necessary to uphold an exercise of the power of eminent domain, it can hardly be said to be sufficient to require an exercise of police power.

Other purposes.

In order to uphold drainage laws the courts have regarded almost any purpose as sufficient which was conducive to the public welfare.

The taking of land for a ditch to drain a public highway is a taking for a public purpose. Smeaton v. Martin, 57 Wis. 864, 15 N. W. 403.

The power of eminent domain, which is called into exercise to some extent in a proceeding to establish a drain, can be exercised only when the work to be accomplished inures, either directly or indirectly, to the benefit of the public, or involves some public use. But it is of sufficient public utility if it benefits a public highway of the county. Helck v. Voight, 110 Ind. 279, 11 N. E. 806.

The property of a citizen cannot be taken for the mere private advantage of another citizen. But drains may be constructed if they will be of public utility, or if by their construction the public health will be improved, or one or more of the highways of the county will be benefited. Anderson v. Baker, 98 Ind. 587.

It is sufficient if the proposed ditch will contribute in any reasonable degree to the public health, convenience, or welfare. It is not sufficient that the ditch will drain the lands adjacent to it, or enable the owners of adjacent lands to raise larger and better crops, but the public health, convenience, or welfare must in some way suffer for want of the ditch. The public convenience may be subserved by the fact that in times of freshets water which overflows turnpikes and bridges, will be carried away more rapidly, and with less injury to such roads and bridges. If the construction of the ditch will

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding instituted by the petitioners for the purpose of causing certain low and wet lands in the county of Orange, in this state, of which they were the owners, to be drained through ditches to be constructed over the lands of others; and the warrant for its commencement, and for the various steps which have been taken, is claimed to be found in chapter 384 of the Laws of 1895. The act provided, in its first section, that "a person owning agricultural lands within this state may institute proceedings for the drainage of such lands or the protection thereof from overflow, by the construction and maintenance of a drain or dyke, on the lands of another person, or the use of mechanical devices, by presenting a verified petition to the county court of the county in which such lands are located, or, if in more than one county, to a special term of the supreme court of the district where the lands or a part thereof are situated, setting forth a general description of the lands to be drained or protected, the names and places of residence of the owners of all lands affected by the proceeding, so far as the same can with reasonable diligence be ascertained, and a prayer for the appointment of three commissioners." Other sections provide for the service of a notice of the time and place of the presentation of the petition, and regulate matters of procedure. They provide for the appointment of three disinterested and resident commissioners, who are to hear the parties and determine whether the lands lead to a more healthful community and a more prosperous neighborhood, and will result in the reclamation or bettering of a considerable quantity of low, wet, or swamp lands, or drain stagnant ponds, thereby improving the public highways of the vicinity and health of the community, and increasing the value of the land of the surrounding country of the proposed ditch, the ditch will be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare. Thomas v. County Comrs. 5 Ohio N. P. 449.

Limited public sufficient.

It is not necessary that the entire public or all the people of the state should be directly affected by the drainage. It is sufficient if a particular community is affected.

It is not necessary, in order that a use may be regarded as public, that the whole community, or any large portion of it, may participate in it. If the drain is of public benefit the fact that some individuals may be specially benefited over others affected by it will not deprive it of its public character. Ross v. Davis, 97 Ind. 79.

Private property may be appropriated for a drainage ditch if it will be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare of the neighborhood through which it is located. A more general necessity is not required. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Hancock County Comrs. (Ohio) 57 N. E. 1009.

It is the public health, convenience, and welfare of the community to be affected by the proposed ditch, and not that of the public at large, that is to be regarded in determining the power of the legislature. Chesbrough v. Putnam & P. Counties Comrs. 37 Ohio St. 508.

Although the drainage may be confined to a specific district, the work may still be public. Hartwell v. Armstrong, 19 Barb. 166.

That the works authorized to effect drainage of land do not extend beyond a particular, and it may be a small, district, does not prevent the purpose from being public. Re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 88.

The question of public utility has reference to the drain as a whole, without regard to the county lines which may cross it. Meranda v. Spurlin, 100 Ind. 380.

In Coomes v. Burt, 22 Pick. 422, the court, without considering the question of the constitutionality of the statute, explains its purpose as follows: The legislature provided that, so far as the lands of the proprietors to be benefited were concerned, treating them as owners of a common property, and regarding the common and general benefit of all, such ditches might be cut as the common interest might require. So far as they had an interest in the watercourse leading from the premises or lands to be benefited by the improvement, they should have, through the agency of the commissioners, an unobstructed enjoyment of this outlet.

Under a scheme by which a corporation is created for the drainage of land having no interest in the property other than it can make out of the execution of the work with full power to initiate proceedings without the consent of those most deeply concerned in it, the power of eminent domain cannot be exercised. State, Kean, Prosecutor, v. Driggs Drainage Co. 45 N. J. L. 91.

The legislature cannot place private property in the hands of a commission to be drained for the benefit of its owner against his consent, upon application of persons who make a contract for the work, and who are to receive compensation for doing the work. Coster v. Tide-Water Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 54, Affirmed in Tide-Water Co. v. Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 518, 90 Am. Dec. 634, upon the ground that no provision was made for the indemnification of the owner of land subjected to the operation of the law in case the expense of the improvement should exceed the benefits which should be conferred.

Presumption as to public character.

The presumption is in favor of the public character of a use which is declared to be public by the legislature. Heick v. Voight, 110 Ind. 279, 11 N. E. 306.

The case must be very clear to authorize the court in interfering with the action of the legislature in providing for drainage. Hartwell v. Armstrong, 19 Barb. 166.

The presumption is that a municipal corporation, when constructing a sewer in its corporate capacity, acts for a public purpose, and for the benefit of the community at large or the people generally in the locality of the improvement, and not merely in the interest of a particular individual who may petition for such improvement, and who may be specially benefited thereby. McDaniel v. Columbus, 91 Ga. 462, 17 S. E. 1011.

shall be drained; whether for that purpose it is necessary that a drain shall be opened through the lands of another; what the amount of damage, if any, sustained by other landowners by reason of the opening of the drain; and any other and further steps with reference to the proceeding. They provide for the organization of the commissioners as a board, and, after viewing the premises, and taking proofs for a determination as to the necessity for the opening of the drain as prayed; for the filing of that determination, and for publication of a notice thereof; for further proceedings thereafter in the making of maps and surveys; for the construction of the work; and, in the case of an inability to agree upon the amount of compensation and damages, for the determination thereof by the commissioners, and an assessment upon the lands to be benefited. The commissioners are to take into account any benefits accrued, and may deduct the amount of the benefit from the amount of the damage. The damages and expenses are to be assessed in proportion to the amount of benefit received. Notice is to be given to the persons whose lands are affected and who have appeared on a hearing upon the assessment, and thereafter a corrected assessment roll is to be filed, and personal notice thereof given. Provision is made for an application by the commissioners for judgments against any persons not having paid the assessment, and such judgments shall be docketed and become a lien upon lands, enforceable as provided in such cases by the Code of Civil Procedure. As briefly as possible, this survey of the act presents its principal features. The petitioners in this proceeding followed the procedure of the act, and commissioners were appointed by the county court, who determined in favor of the drainage prayed for and as to its manner, and who borrowed moneys, under orders of the county court, and caused the ditches to be constructed. They made an assessment of the damages and expenses upon the lands of various persons, including these respondents, and gave notice of a hearing of any person aggrieved by the same, which was had, and a corrected assessment roll was thereafter made and filed. Subsequently an application was made by the commissioners to the county judge for an order directing the entry of judgments against various landowners who had not paid their assessments, which was granted. These respondents, who opposed the assessment and the application of the commissioners for the judgments, appealed from the order of the county judge and from the judgments entered thereupon to the appellate division, where the order and the judgments were reversed and the proceeding was dismissed, upon the ground, in substance, that the act of 1895 was unconstitutional for authorizing the exercise of the power of taxation in favor of a single person. The commissioners and certain of the petitioners then appealed to this court.

The question which we have before us involves primarily the consideration of the amendment of § 7 of article 1 of the state 49 L. R. A.

Constitution adopted in 1894, which is relied upon as validating the enactment by the legislature of the drainage act of 1895. The section of the Constitution referred to reads in its entirety as follows: "When private property shall be taken for any public use, the compensation to be made therefor, when such compensation is not made by the state, shall be ascertained by a jury, or by not less than three commissioners appointed by a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law. Private roads may be opened in the manner to be prescribed by law; but in every case the necessity of the road and the amount of all damage to be sustained by the opening thereof shall be first determined by a jury of freeholders, and such amount, together with the expenses of the proceeding, shall be paid by the person to be benefited. General laws may be passed permitting the owners or occupants of agricultural lands to construct and maintain for the drainage thereof, necessary drains, ditches, and dykes upon the lands of others, under proper restrictions and with just compensation, but no special laws shall be enacted for such purposes." The portion of the section italicized contains the amendment in question, and it is objected to it that it is violative of the Federal Constitution, in that the taking of private property for a use not public, but strictly private, is authorized, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. If the amendment is in conflict with any of the provisions of the Federal Constitution, it must fail; for, within its sphere of operation, that instrument is supreme, and no more by constitutional provisions than by legislation can the states of the Union override its prohibitions. It is an ancient principle, which entered into our social compact, that the use for which private property may be taken must be a public one, whether the taking be by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or by that of taxation. The sovereign power is incapable of conferring any right to interfere with private property, except it be needed for public objects. To take land for any other than a public use; to take it from one citizen and to transfer it to another, even for full compensation,—would be to violate the contract by which the land was originally granted by government. Beekman v. Saratoga & S. R. Co. 3 Paige, 45, 73, 22 Am. Dec. 679; Bloodgood v. Mohawk & H. Rivers R. Co. 18 Wend. 9, 31 Am. Dec. 313. The 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, in prohibiting a state from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, protects the citizen against the taking of his property for any other than a public use, either under the guise of taxation, or by the assumption of the right of eminent domain. Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 158, 41 L. ed. 388, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56. It is a security against the arbitrary spoliation of property, or any abridgment of the immunities of citizens of the United States. The state Constitution, from the beginning, by authorizing the appropriation of private property for public use, impliedly declared that for any other use private property should not be taken from one, and applied to the private use of another. Re Albany Street, 11 Wend. 149, 25 Am. Dec. 618. It was observed by Judge Denio in People ex rel. Herrick v. Smith, 21 N. Y., at page 598, that it would not be due process of law to "appropriate the property of one citizen for the use of another, or to confiscate the property of one person or a class of persons, or a particular description of property, upon some view of public policy, where it could not be said to be taken for a public use." Whether that is a public use, for which private property is authorized to be taken, will depend upon the object aimed at, and whether the plan has such an obvious or recognized character of public utility as to justify the exercise of the right of eminent domain or of the power of taxation in its favor. I suppose, in that consideration, when some new constitutional provision is in question, regard should be had to prior conditions in the laws and in the decisions of the courts of the state upon the subject, which illustrate some settled policy of the community. That can be understood by reference to the cases which arose under the mill acts in the New England states, the irrigation acts in the Western states, and the drainage statute of New Jersey. Head v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 113 U. S. 9, 28 L. ed. 889, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441; Wurts v. Hoagland, 114 U. S. 606, 29 L. ed. 229, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1086; Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 41 L. ed. 369, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56. The statutes in those cases were justified, either in view of a policy in force prior to the adoption of the state Constitutions, or, within a similar principle, by long exercise of a legislative power which the state courts had sustained. In Wurts v. Hoagland the New Jersey drainage statute discussed was framed in the public interest. It authorized the board of managers of the geological survey, "upon the application of at least five owners of separate lots of land," etc., to examine the tract, and, if they deemed it for the interest of the public and the landowners affected thereby, to adopt a system of drainage, and to report it to the supreme court of the state, etc. It was observed in the opinion that several drainage laws, and the assessment of the expense of the work upon all the lands in the tract in question, "have long existed in the state of New Jersey, and have been sustained and acted on by her courts under the constitution of 1776, as well as under that of 1844," and the case was held to come "within the principle upon which this court upheld the validity of general mill acts in Head v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 113 U. S. 9, 28 L. ed. 889, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441. In Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, the California irrigation act was upheld, in view of the various enactments, constitutional and legislative, together with the decisions of the state court that such a use of water was a public one. It was observed that they were 49 L. R. A.

not binding upon the court; but in their light and under the facts and circumstances surrounding the subject-matter, in regard to which the use was questioned, there could be little difficulty in arriving at the same conclusion as the California court. The provision for the opening of private roads in the constitutional section under consideration represented a public policy dating from 1772, when the first statute upon the subject was enacted. This statute continued in full and active operation as a law of the state upon the adoption of our Constitution in 1777, which continued such parts of the common law in force as had formed the law of the colony. It was embodied in the Revised Statutes (1 Rev. Stat. 513, §§ 54, 77, 79), and then, in 1846, was added to the Constitution. It was an evident public policy of the state, long acquiesced in, that facilities should be furnished for private ways, so that the property of citizens might be made accessible. Satterly v. Winne, 101 N. Y. 218, 225, 4 N. E. 185. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (*532), observed that the common law has never sanctioned an appropriation of property upon such considerations as the improvement and cultivation of the wild lands of the state, the drainage of low lands, etc., and that some further element must be involved before the appropriation can be regarded as sanctioned by our Constitutions. He further remarked that "the reason of the case, and the settled practice of free governments, must be our guides in determining what is or is not to be regarded a public use."

In this state, prior to the adoption of this constitutional amendment, a general drainage law appeared in the Revised Statutes (2 Rev. Stat. p. 548); but it was very early declared by this court to be unconstitutional, as authorizing the taking of the property of the owner of the land, and transferring it to the applicant for the ditch, against the consent of the owner. Gilbert v. Foote, not reported, but cited in White v. White, 5 Barb., at page 483, in 1849, and referred to in Re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 88. It was said of Gilbert v. Foote by Judge Folger, in Ryers' Case, that "it is understood that the judgment of this court . . . went mainly upon the ground that the act sought to permit the taking of private property for a private use, which was not a use for a private way." In 1869 a general act for the drainage of swamps and the like was passed (chap. 888, Laws 1869), the constitutionality of which was challenged in Ryers' Case. It contained a provision that the commissioners appointed by the court upon the application of the petitioners should determine, not only the question of the necessity of the ditch for drainage purposes, but "whether it is necessary for the public health," and other provisions restricted the purpose of the proceeding to that of the benefit of the public health. Such provisions were doubtless inserted in amendment of the prior general drainage statute, and to obviate the objection to its constitutionality. Re Draining in Chili, 5 Hun, 116. The opinion of this court in Ryers' Case proceeded upon the proposition of the right to take private property for public use, making due compensation therefor, and that the maintenance and promotion of the public health were matters of public concern. It was held to be a constitutional power of legislation to provide for removing or abating that which has become a public nuisance, injuring the public health. "We are not called upon in this case," Judge Folger observed, "to uphold an act which has for its purpose the benefit of individuals. As before said, it avows, and avows only, a public purpose. . . . We wish to be distinctly understood that we sustain this act as constitutional solely for that it plainly has for its purpose the preservation and promotion of the public health." A reading of the act of 1869 makes it perfectly apparent that, within its scope, the object of drainage proceedings was confined to cases where they were demanded in the interest of the public health. It must be conceded, therefore, that up to 1894 such a drainage proceeding as would be authorized under this amendment to our Constitution, being for a private purpose, was neither sanctioned by the laws, nor upheld by the courts. The policy of the state, thus evidenced, was manifestly founded on the sanctity of private property rights under the social compact, and was adverse to any legislation which would violate it. It was well within the legislative power to make the state the sole actor, and in the interest of a public necessity or convenience to authorize such interference by the public authorities with private rights as would abate conditions prejudicial to the health or comfort of the community, or to authorize private persons to take the initiative in the same direction of public utility. In the drainage statute in question in the Nearing Case, 27 N. Y. 306, for instance, the legislature appointed the commissioners to drain the wet and swamp lands of the town of Cicero, and directed their procedure. The state was the actor in the matter, and thus the presumption of a public purpose or necessity was conclusively furnished. The legislative action was similar in the acts referred to in Hartwell v. Armstrong, 19 Barb. 166, and in People ex rel. Parker v. Jefferson County Ct. 55 N. Y. 2. 604. But, lacking public ends, I find nothing in the past political history of the state which would justify laws by which a citizen may be authorized to take the property of his neighbor, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, for a purpose which is primarily for his private benefit, although incidentally of such possible benefit generally as any improvement of agricultural lands would result in. Such legislation is not sound in principle, and we are not embarrassed by any long acquiescence, or by either judicial or legislative precedents, in so asserting, or in holding that no imperative reasons of public policy warrant the delegation

When the Constitution of this state was amended in this way by the people in 1894, it was intended, undoubtedly, by embodying in the organic law an authorization for the passage of general laws permitting owners of agricultural lands to construct and maintain ditches for the drainage of their properties, to conclusively sanction such legislation thereafter. The probable intent of any law may often be stated from a consideration of the political conditions which existed, the presence of which might be deemed, not unnaturally, to operate upon the lawmakers. An amendment of the organic law of the state represents the expression of the dominant popular sentiment upon the subject, and in this instance it undoubtedly represents a purpose to make that lawful which before was not. The reasoning would be that if it was unconstitutional, and therefore unlawful, before, to authorize the taking of private property for the private purpose of the drainage of agricultural lands, by giving it constitutional warrant it would become lawful to do so, if, indeed, the plan might not be perforce invested with a public interest. But this result would and should not be attained if the constitutional amendment was in conflict with those provisions of the supreme law of the land, embodied in the Federal Constitution, which guarantee the citizen against the taking of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The amendment of our Constitution does not, in terms, declare its object to be a public one. Indeed, I think that its language, by a fair reading, rather negatives such an inference, and imports that the object is the private benefit of the landowner; for the purpose is stated to be the drainage, only, of his lands, and he is to make just compensation for the land appropriated to that purpose. I conceive the proper rule of construction to be that, if the amendment expressed a purpose theretofore recognized as public, it would afford that sufficient sanction for subsequent legislation on the subject which might be needed. But if the object had been theretofore deemed not of a public nature or of public concern, and it touches some personal immunity secured by the law of the land, its presence in the Constitution will not have the effect of removing the fundamental objection to it. I do not believe that the people of the state can affect or impair the obligation of the social compact by adopting as a part of the organic law a provision which will permit of the taking of private property for a purpose which is essentially of private benefit, and which has always been held to be such. When the amendment says that "general laws may be passed permitting the owners and occupants of agricultural lands to construct and maintain for the drainage thereof necessary drains," etc., it means that the legislature may authorize any such person to take another's land for a purely private purpose; and that is in conflict with the inhibition of the bill of rights, and violates the guaranties of the Federal Constitution. If the citizen invokes the guaranties of the Federal Constitution for his protection against the enforcement of a law which an amendment of the state Constitution purports to authorize, I perceive no valid reason, if he is right in his claim to protection, that we should not recognize it. I am not able to resist the conclusion that the constitutional amendment in question is invalid and inoperative.

If, however, the amendment in question can be upheld as valid, upon the assumption that it removes a constitutional limitation upon legislation providing for the drainage of agricultural lands, and that it can rest for its justification upon a common local necessity, independent of the public health, and concerning the promotion of the prosperity of the community, then it seems clear to me that it affords no warrant for the enactment of this drainage law. The section of the article of the Constitution to which the amendment was added prescribed the tribunal which shall ascertain the compensation to be made for the private property "taken for any public use," and then proceeded to provide for the opening of private roads, and that the payment of the amount of the damage to be sustained by their opening and the expense of the proceeding "shall be paid by the person to be benefited." In this extension of the law of eminent domain to such a case in the Constitution of 1846 there was to be no assessment of damages and expenses upon the nonassenting owners of the lands taken for the private road; and the act passed in 1853 by the legislature, regulating the procedure, strictly followed the constitutional requirement in that respect. Laws 1853, chap. 174, § 14. When the amendment under consideration was added in 1894, by the force of its own language, as by necessary implication from its association with the other provisions of the section, the plain intent was that the landowner seeking to construct a drain through other lands, in invitum their owners, should make compensation for the land appropriated, and himself bear the expense. The only general laws authorized were those "permitting the owners and occupants of agricultural lands to construct . . . for the drainage thereof necessary drains," etc., "upon the lands of others, under proper restrictions and with just compensation." This language is not susceptible, by any fair reading, of a construction which warrants the assessment upon the landowner proceeded against of a proportionate share of the damages and expenses. The Constitution, as an instrument framed by the people for the regulation of the government, should be read with the usual significance given to words and phrases by persons of ordinary intelligence; and nothing should be implied which would add to the individual burden, or which would be in further derogation of individual rights. That which the words declare is the meaning of the instrument, and neither courts nor legislators have the right to add 49 L. R. A.

to or take from that meaning. Newell v. People ex rel. Phelps, 7 N. Y. 9, 97. If the amendment is so read, it only authorizes laws which will enable an agricultural landowner, desirous of draining his lands, to exercise the right of eminent domain, and thereunder to appropriate another's lands for the purpose, under such restrictions as shall be deemed proper to be made, and upon his making due compensation. No right is conferred or implied to assess a portion of the cost and expense upon the other landowners. Nor could it authorize such an assessment, without violating the Federal Constitution; for that would be to authorize the levying of a tax for a private purpose.

In the enactment of the drainage law of 1895, the legislature went far beyond the terms of the constitutional warrant; for the act provided, in addition to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, that a petitioner might compel the cost of the proceeding and of the work to be apportioned between all landowners deemed benefited by the commissioners. The scope and intentment of the law are that the expense of constructing the drain and the damage for the appropriation of property shall be borne by the petitioners jointly with the owners of the land taken, in proportion to benefits accrued. As we have pointed out, the amendment does not authorize this, and the legislature has only that general power with respect to taxation as would justify its exercise for public purposes. Private property may be constitutionally taken for public use by taxation, as it may by right of eminent domain, and the compensation which must be specially made in the latter case, when property is taken, is deemed to be received, when property is taken under the power of taxation, in the protection afforded by government to the life, liberty, and property of persons, or in the increase of the value of their possessions by the application of their moneys to the public purpose. People ex rel. Griffin v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 419, 55 Am. Dec. 266. In taxation, or in taking private property for public uses, the individual is presumed to receive, or in fact does receive, some equivalent for his contribution. The legislature is doubtless the final judge as to what the public necessity and the general good require to be done, as to the extent of taxation therefor, and as to its apportionment, and it constitutes no objection to the exercise of the power of taxation that the burden thereof should be laid upon the territorial district which is exclusively affected by the legislative scheme. Darlington v. New York, 31 N. Y. 164, 88 Am. Dec. 248. That taxation can be authorized for a purpose not public is a contradiction in terms, and it would be an illegal assumption of power. Property is taken by assessment, which is a form of taxation, as much as if it were taken by right of eminent domain, and the warrant for it must be found in some public purpose. "The right of eminent domain or inherent sovereign power gives the legislature control of private property for public uses, and only for such uses." Per Grover, J., in Brevcoort v. Grace, 53 N. Y. 245. The plan of the act of 1895 to permit the assessment of the owners of the lands taken for the construction of a drain was, in my opinion, plainly void, under the state and the Federal Constitutions, as involving the power to levy a tax for the private purpose of a landowner. If the legislature can enforce the construction of a drain at the instance of one person at the joint cost of himself and of the objecting landowners, the salutary checks imposed upon legislative power for the protection of the citizen become valueless. I quite agree, also, with the views expressed at the appellate division with respect to the power of taxation conferred by the act. To quote from the language of the opinion: "Under its provisions the authority to tax may be exercised in favor of a single person for the improvement of a single acre of agricultural land,—a result which we feel certain was not within the contemplation of the framers of the constitutional provision." As this act confers the right to take property in derogation of private rights, it is to be strictly construed. People ex rel. More v. Jefferson County Ct. 56 Barb. 136. It has but one object, and that is to enforce the construction of the work needed to drain or to protect agricultural lands at the joint cost of the petitioner or petitioners and of the owners of the lands taken for the purpose. All of its provisions are connected as parts of a single scheme, which, in any view, must fail for the reasons given.

Nor was there any waiver on the part of the respondents of their right to object. They opposed the application of the commissioners to the county court for the order directing the entry of judgments against them for the amount of the assessment attempted to be levied upon them. It does not appear that they had consented to any procedure, or that they had estopped themselves by their conduct from opposing the attempt to assess them for the cost and expense of the work.

Upon either of the grounds that I have discussed, the conclusion must be reached that the order and judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

Parker, Ch. J., concurring:

While I agree with Judge Gray that the statute under consideration is violative of the state Constitution, and therefore concur with him in the result, I am at the same time confident that it was the design of the recent amendment to § 7 of article 1 of the Constitution to authorize legislation providing a workable scheme by which to secure the drainage of tracts of land, whether large or small, in order to provide for their proper utilization, thus establishing it to be a part of the fundamental law of the state that such drainage constitutes a public use, and that such section is not in conflict with the Federal Constitution.

A contract by which the owner of a farm agrees with another person that the latter shall occupy and cultivate it, each furnishing a certain part of the seed, implements, and stock, and which provides that the products shall be divided at the end of a given term, or sold and the proceeds divided, does not make the occupant a partner of the owner, who will have the powers of a surviving partner on the owner's death, but only a tenant or agent.

Dowling, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant's decedent owned, and was in the possession of, a farm of 160 acres, in Washington county, Indiana. He entered into a farming contract with the appellee for the term of one year from March 1, 1898. The agreement was by parol. By its provisions, the appellee was to have the possession of the tract for one year from and after March 1, 1898. He was to cultivate the same, the decedent designating what crops should be planted, and in what fields they should be raised. Appellee was to have the house, the barn, and the garden plot, and was to pay $2.50 per month as rent for them. He was to furnish all work, labor, and farming implements, excepting one half of a mowing machine; also one half of all seeds for all crops, excepting timothy seed for meadow, all of which was to be furnished by decedent in case he required the same to be sowed in wheat ground. Decedent was to furnish the other half of all seeds. Each crop grown on said lands was to be divided into two equal parts after it was harvested or gathered, and one of these parts was to belong to the decedent and the other to the appellee. Each party was to pay for threshing one half of the wheat, oats, and timothy seed, and, excepting such parts of said grain and seed as the parties mutually agreed to store for later disposition in the markets or otherwise, the said grains and seed were to be equally divided at the machine. Neither party was to haul away from said lands any of the hay, corn, straw, fodder, or unthreshed oats, but the same were to be fed to the stock on the said farm. One half of all live stock was to be furnished by each party, and appellee was to care for and feed the same. Neither party was to create any indebtedness for which the other could be made liable. The decedent was to direct when any of the stock should be sold, and upon a sale of stock appellee was to pay decedent one half of the amount received therefor. All stock and fowls, hay, grain, and oats were to be divided, share and share alike, before March 1, 1899, and, if a division could not be agreed upon in any case, the stock not divided was to be sold, and the proceeds divided before March 1, 1899. It is alleged in the complaint that the appellee took possession of the land under this agreement, that each party furnished the seed, grain, live stock, and other articles required by its terms, and that appellant's decedent died March 11, 1898. It is further alleged that the appellant and appellee acted upon the agreement after the death of said decedent.

It is charged that appellee raised upon said lands, during said term, crops of wheat, oats, hay, corn, and stock of the value of $800, bill of the particulars of which is filed with the complaint; that the appellee sold and disposed of all the stock, grain, and fowls, corn, hay, oats, and timothy seed; that appellant has demanded from the appellee one half of the amounts so received by him, due to said estate, but that, with the exception of one half of the wheat grown on said lands, the appellee wrongfully retains the same in his possession. The second paragraph of the complaint does not differ materially from the first, except that it alleges a demand for an accounting, and a refusal on the part of the appellee to account, and also that the money and property belonging to the estate of said decedent in the hands of the appellee are required to pay to the widow her statutory allowance of $500. A demurrer to each paragraph of the complaint was sustained by the court, and judgment was rendered for appellee. These rulings are assigned for error.

The objections taken to each paragraph of the complaint are that it appears from the agreement sued upon that the appellee and the decedent were partners, or at least tenants in common of the property on the farm, and that in either case one of the parties having died, the appellee, as survivor, is entitled to the possession of the property so held until he has fully settled the business, and that until such settlement is made the appellant has no right to sue. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 835; Powell v. Bennett, 131 Ind. 465, 30 N. E. 518; McIntosh v. Zaring, 150 Ind. 301, 49 N. E. 164; Valentine v. Wyson, 123 Ind. 47, 7 L. R. A. 788, 23 N. E. 1076; Thompson v. Lowe, 111 Ind. 272, 12 N. E. 476; Needham v. Wright, 140 Ind. 190, 39 N. E. 510; Holmes v. McCray, 51 Ind. 358, 19 Am. Rep. 735; and Kenyon v. Williams, 19 Ind. 44,—are referred to as sustaining these objections. Most of these cases decide nothing more than that, where a partnership is shown to exist, one partner cannot maintain an action against another for his share of the partnership assets until the business of the firm has been wound up, the debts paid, and nothing remains to be done but to divide the residue of the partnership property. Kenyon v. Williams, 19 Ind. 44, holds that a partnership may assist in the business of buying and selling real estate. The main question here is not as to the rights of partners in partnership property, but whether the agreement between the decedent and the appellee created a partnership. While many definitions of the term "partnership" are given by jurists and courts, and various tests have been proposed by which its existence may be determined, no general rule on the subject has been or can be laid down which will apply to all cases. An author of great and exact learning states the law thus: "In short, the true rule, ex æquo et bono, would seem to be that the agreement and intention of the parties themselves should govern in all the cases. If they intended a partnership in the capital stock, or in the profits, or in both, then that that same rule should apply in favor of third persons, even if the agreement were unknown to them; and, on the other hand, if no such partnership were intended between the parties, then that there should be none as to third persons, unless where the parties had held themselves out as partners to the public, or their conduct operated as a fraud and deceit upon third persons." Story, Partn. § 49. Such intention must, of course, be legally ascertained; and mere declarations of the persons interested and uniting in the prosecution of a common enterprise that no partnership existed, would not be permitted to control the legal effect of acts or proceedings from which the existence of a partnership is by the law presumed. It is also to be observed that, where the rights of third parties are not involved, the contract will be liberally construed with reference to the actual understanding of the parties and the objects they had in view. Hitchings v. Ellis, 12 Gray, 449. There are obvious reasons for holding that farm contracts or agricultural agreements, by which the owner of lands contracts with another that such lands shall be occupied and cultivated by the latter, each party furnishing a certain proportion of the seed, implements, and stock, and that the products shall be divided at the end of a given term, or sold, and the proceeds divided, shall not be construed as creating a partnership between the parties. Such agreements are common in this country, are usually very informal in their character, often resting in parol as in the present case. In the absence of stipulations or evidence clearly manifesting a contrary purpose, it will not be presumed that the parties to such an agreement intend to assume the important and intricate responsibilities of partners, or to incur the inconveniences and dangers frequently incident to that relation. The parties to such agreements seldom contemplate anything more than a tenancy of the land, with provision for compensation to the landlord from the fidelity, labor, and skill of the tenant. There is no community of interest in the land, which is the principal thing in the agreement, and a division and several ownership of the crops and other products are usually provided for. While the custom of renting farm lands upon shares is general, the courts have seldom held that such agreements create partnerships between the owner of the land and the tenant. A large majority of the cases construe them as creating tenancies only. Chase v. Barrett, 4 Paige, 148; Quackenbush v. Sawyer, 54 Cal. 439; Chapman v. Eames, 67 Me. 452; Warner v. Abbey, 112 Mass. 355; Dixon v. Nicolls, 39 Ill. 372, 89 Am. Dec. 312; Alwood v. Ruckman, 21 Ill. 200; Putnam v. Wise, 1 Hill, 234, 37 Am. Dec. 309. The agreement in question relates exclusively to the dealings of the parties with each other, and not with third persons. It distinctly separates their rights in the use and occupation of the land and in the ownership of its products. Such products and live stock were to be divided in specie, except that, where a division of the live stock could not be agreed upon, it was to be sold, and the amount received therefor divided. No debts were to be contracted by either party for which the other would be liable. Under this agreement the authority of the appellee to make sales of the live stock was that of an agent, and not that of a partner. Upon a fair construction of the agreement, it is evident that the appellee was the tenant and agent of the decedent, and in no sense a partner. The complaint disclosed that the appellee had in his possession moneys and property belonging to the estate of the decedent, to which the appellant, as administratrix, was entitled. The possession of the appellee of such money and property of his landlord being that of an agent, his failure and refusal to render an account of his dealings, and to make a settlement with the administratrix of the decedent, was a fraud upon the rights of the appellant. The situation of the parties and the circumstances set forth in the complaint render a discovery indispensable to establish the appellant's right, the appellee being liable for the amount realized from the sale of the property if such amount exceeded its market value, or for its market value if it was disposed of by the appellee for a less sum. Upon the face of the complaint no pretext appears for the failure of the appellee to render an account, turn over the property of the decedent to the appellant, and pay into her hands the moneys held by him belonging to the estate. The term of the tenancy has expired; all the crops and live stock have been sold, or are in a condition to be divided; there are no debts to be paid, and nothing remains to be done but to make the settlement.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrers to the complaint, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

v.
Edward B. REYNOLDS.

(.....Ind.....)

A city does not become indebted beyond its constitutional limit by a contract under which a person is to erect upon its land a city hall, to be leased to the city at an agreed and fair rental for a term of years, with the option to purchase the building, or, if this is not exercised, with an option to the lessor to remove it or buy the land at its statutory appraised valuation, where it does not appear that the current revenues of the city will not be sufficient to pay the indebtedness for rent each year, together with all other expenses for which the city is liable.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Joseph County in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to enjoin the execution of a contract for the construction of a city hall. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. M. Cunningham, Anderson, DuShane, & Crabill, and Howard & Orr, for appellants:

Common councils are given general control of the finances and property of cities, and they are particularly authorized to purchase, hold, or convey real estate for the purpose of constructing public buildings thereon, or using the same for other public purposes.

Burns's Rev. Stat. § 3541 (Horner's Rev. Stat. § 3106).

Discretionary powers vested by law in municipal corporations are not subject to judicial control, except in case of fraud or gross abuse of such discretion. Nor is mere difference of opinion sufficient reason for the interference of courts.

When a municipal corporation contracts for a usual and necessary thing, and agrees to pay for it annually or monthly, as furnished, the contract does not create an indebtedness for the aggregate sum of all the instalments since the debt for each year or month does not come into existence until it is earned.

The circumstance that an incorporated town may be prohibited from incurring any debt without being authorized so to do by a petition from a majority of the resident owners of real estate does not prevent the trustees of such town from contracting for a term of years for articles of necessity.

The allegations in the answer, that the city will have money on hand derived from the current revenues to be collected, to pay that proportion of the indebtedness which falls due each year, can have no influence upon the question.

It would be inconsistent with the objects of the constitutional provision enacted to protect municipal corporations, to make their liability depend upon some event that might or might not happen, and upon the honesty and integrity of its officials.

Since it is the intention of the city to exercise an option to purchase at some time in the future, and since the amount paid as rentals can be deducted from the purchase money to be paid, it is a debt secured by the payments that have already been made, and the equitable interest existing thereby in the city will become forfeited upon default in paying the instalments when due.

Brown v. Corry, 175 Pa. 528, 34 Atl. 854.

The agreement is a grant to Oliver, and a contract by him to convey on payment according to the terms of the contract. What is called annual rents are annual payments to be applied as purchase money. The criterion of this is that on payment of the amount due the city has a right to demand a conveyance; the city having an interest by payment of a part of the purchase money every year, and the future payments are each year secured by the payments theretofore made.

Mr. John H. Bradley also for appellee.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee sued appellants, the city of South Bend and James Oliver, to enjoin them from carrying out a contract executed by them, on the ground that the city thereby became indebted beyond the constitutional limit. A demurrer to the answer for want of facts was sustained, and judgment rendered in favor of appellee.

It appears from the record: That the city of South Bend on October 18, 1899, was the owner and in possession of certain real estate described in the complaint, which had been purchased and was held for the purpose of erecting thereon a city hall for the use of the several departments of the city government. That on said day said city and James Oliver, coappellant, entered into a written agreement which provides that said Oliver have permission to enter upon said real estate and erect thereon a city hall for the use of said city; said structure to remain the property of said Oliver unless and until the city should exercise the option given by said contract to purchase the same. That the hall shall be suitable for the needs of the city; and according to named plans and specifications; the contract for construction to be let to the best bidder, after due notice; the cost not to exceed $75,000; and all contracts to be approved by the city. That the building, when completed, be leased to the city for twelve years, with a right of renewal for five years longer, at a rental of $7,200, to be paid annually as the same shall accrue from year to year. Oliver gives, and the city reserves, an option to purchase the building at the termination of the lease, or at any time during the term, at a price equal to the original contract price thereof, with 4 per cent interest per annum, less the sum of the several amounts of rent then paid thereon with 4 per cent interest per annum on each item of said rent from the date of its payment. In case the city fail to exercise its option to purchase, Oliver has the option either to remove the building, or to purchase the ground at its statutory appraised valuation, within six months after the termination of said lease. Should he fail to exercise his option, the structure thereby becomes the property of the city. In case the exercise of any option is delayed by any order of court or by some overpowering necessity, the time so lost is not to be counted. The city is to pay taxes and insurance, but in case of fire the insurance is to be invested in repair of the old building, or in the erection of a new one. That when said contract was entered into, and since that date, said city was indebted in an amount equal to the constitutional limit. That said rent of $7,200 to be paid annually by said city was no more than the fair rental value of said building mentioned in said contract, and described in the plans and specifications. That such expense for rent was a part of the current expenses of said city government, and was amply provided for by the annual city tax levy. That there was already in the city-hall fund, in the city treasury, nearly enough money for two years' rent, and the current revenues for the year 1899 will provide more than enough for a third year's rent. If the foregoing facts show that by said contract said city became indebted beyond the constitutional limit, the judgment must be affirmed; otherwise, it must be reversed.

It is settled in this state that if a city contracts for water, light, or other things which pertain to its ordinary and necessary expenses, and agrees to pay for the same annually or monthly as furnished, such contract does not create an indebtedness for the aggregate sum of all the annual or monthly payments, because the debt for each year or month does not come into existence until it is earned. But if the indebtedness of the city already equals or exceeds the constitutional limit, and the current revenues are not sufficient to pay such indebtedness when it comes into existence, including other expenses for which the city is liable, an indebtedness is thereby created, and the Constitution is violated. Cason v. Lebanon, 153 Ind. 567, 55 N. E. 768; Laporte v. Gamewell Fire Alarm Teleg. Co. 146 Ind. 466, 35 L. R. A. 680, 45 N. E. 588, and cases cited; Brown v. Corry, 175 Pa. 528, 34 Atl. 854; Erie's Appeal, 91 Pa. 398; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 136, 136a. It is evident that rent for suitable offices for the officers of a city is as much an ordinary and necessary expense as the expense for water and light (Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396, 403), and that, when the city agrees to pay the rent for said offices annually or monthly, the contract does not create an indebtedness for the amount of all the annual or monthly payments. While the rent for suitable offices for city officers is an ordinary and necessary expense, the erection of a city hall or a building for the use of the city officers is not in any sense an ordinary and necessary expense, but is an extraordinary one. Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396, 403. There is a clear and plain distinction between a contract for the use of rooms or a building for city purposes, and the erection by the city of a building to be used for such purposes. The one is an ordinary and necessary expense, while the other involves municipal ownership of the building or rooms, and the means of furnishing the offices, and is an extraordinary expense. Brown v. Corry, 175 Pa. 528, 34 Atl. 854; Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396, 403. Under the contract in this case, however, the city hall is not to be erected by or for the city, but by Mr. Oliver, who is to own the same; the city being the owner of the real estate upon which it is to be erected. The only contract of the city is to pay an annual rent of $7,200, which is admitted to be only a fair rental value for said building, and, if the city does not exercise its option to purchase said building at or before the termination of the lease, to sell and convey the real estate at the price named, provided said Oliver exercises his option to purchase the same within six months after the termination of the lease. If neither party exercises the option provided for in said contract within the time fixed, then the city-hall building becomes the property of the city. Under said contract the city is under no obligation whatever to pay anything for the erection of said building, or to purchase the same when erected. If it should attempt to exercise its option to purchase said building, but cannot do so without violating the constitutional limitation as to becoming indebted, it may be enjoined from exercising such option. No facts are alleged in the complaint showing that the current revenues of the city will not be sufficient to pay the indebtedness for rent under said contract each year when the same comes into existence, including all other expenses for which the city is liable. The allegations of the complaint do not show, therefore, that said contract creates any indebtedness in violation of the Constitution. Cason v. Lebanon, 153 Ind. 567, 55 N. E. 768.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to carry appellee's demurrer to the answer back, and sustain the same, to the complaint.

v.

City of SHELBYVILLE.

(.....Ind.....)

1. The legislature may create, or authorize a municipality to create, a local taxing district for local-improvement purposes, which includes part only of the property within the municipality.

2. The legislature may declare conclusively that special assessments on account of local improvements within a taxing district shall be limited to property within that district.
3. A special assessment of property for a local improvement must be limited to the benefits which it actually receives.
4. A taxing district as a whole may be assessed on account of a local improvement therein, only to the extent of the sum of the special benefits actually received by the several parcels of contributing property.
5. The cost of a local improvement in excess of the special benefits resulting to the several parcels of property in the taxing district must be borne by the general treasury on account of the benefit to the municipality at large.
6. Property owners affected by an improvement within a taxing district are entitled to a hearing on the question of special benefits.
7. Property is not taken without due process of law by an assessment for a local improvement under Acts 1889, p. 237, authorizing by § 8 an estimate of the assessments on the basis of frontage, but providing in § 7 for a hearing of persons aggrieved before the assessment is made, as this provision impliedly authorizes and requires an adjustment of the assessments in conformity with the actual benefits.
8. A primary obligation is imposed upon a city for such deficit, if any, as there may be in the special benefits received, to meet the cost of a local street improvement, where the assessment scheme is pursued in making such improvements,—especially where the statute expressly makes the city liable to the contractor, for the contract price.
9. An ordinance for the assessment upon abutters of the cost of filling with rich dirt and sodding between sidewalk and curb is not authorized by a statute providing for grading and paving the street or the sidewalk.
10. An injunction may be granted against so much of a proposed local improvement as is not authorized by law.

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to NOTE.—For special benefits as basis for assessment, see Asberry v. Roanoke (Va.) 42 L. R. A. 636, and note; Weed v. Boston (Mass.) 42 L. R. A. 642; Rolph v. Fargo (N. D.) 42 L. R. enjoin defendant from undertaking certain street improvements. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Love & Morrison and Adams & Carter, for appellant:

To levy a special assessment on a lot for a street improvement, and to sell that lot to pay such assessment, is to take from the owner of the lot his property. Such assessments have been upheld, but they are upheld on the ground that the lot is benefited by the improvement to the extent of the assessment levied, and on that ground alone.

Philadelphia*, 65 Pa. 146, 3 Am. Rep. 615; Chamberlain v. Cleveland, 34 Ohio St. 551; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Decatur, 147 U. S. 198, 37 L. ed. 134, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187.

If, then, the right to make a special assessment upon the lots abutting on a street, for the purpose of improving the street, rests solely upon the benefit received by each lot from such improvement, no assessment can be made on any lot in excess of the benefit received by it from the improvement.

If the law authorizing such assessment does not in some way provide for ascertaining such benefits, the legislature does in an arbitrary manner strip the owner of the lot of his property, for it does not follow that a lot is actually benefited by improving a street along it.

In so far as a special assessment upon abutting lots for the purpose of improving the street upon which they abut exceeds the special benefit resulting to each lot from such improvement, in that far the owners of such lots are compelled in the most arbitrary manner to yield up their property without any compensation. Such taking of property is an act of spoliation.

The notice provided for, and by which it is sought to give to the property owner "due process of law," clearly is of the kind that 49 L. R. A.

the Supreme Court of the United States declares is not due process, for the reason that, after receiving it, the property owner cannot protect himself, but is compelled to stand by helpless, and see his property taken from him.

The city is to be held strictly within the limits prescribed by the statute, for the acts in question were undertaken under and by virtue of the Barrett law, and this is so declared in the resolution. On that law the improvement must stand or fall.

Lafayette v. Cox, 5 Ind. 38; Robb v. Indianapolis, 38 Ind. 51; Dill. Mun. Corp. 89.

If there is any doubt whether the council has power to do an act, the doubt must be resolved against the power. The power is limited to that which a strict construction will allow.

Lafayette v. Cox, 5 Ind. 38; Dill. Mun. Corp. 89.

In considering the Barrett law for the purpose of ascertaining what power is given to the council, the whole act must be considered, words must have their ordinary meaning, and the intention of the legislature is to be determined from the language used.

Terre Haute v. Mack, 139 Ind. 108, 38 N. E. 468.

In determining the validity of the Barrett law the court is to be guided by the rules of law laid down for the construction of statutes.

Constitutional provisions are superior to legislative enactments. If there is a conflict between them, the latter must yield.

Parker v. State ex rel. Powell, 133 Ind. 187, 18 L. R. A. 567, 32 N. E. 836, 33 N. E. 119; Campbell v. Dwiggins, 83 Ind. 480.

Special assessments have no basis upon which to rest, except the basis that a benefit is conferred upon the property assessed equal to the assessment.

Quill v. Indianapolis, 124 Ind. 299, 7 L. R. A. 681, 23 N. E. 788; Montgomery County Comrs. v. Fullen, 111 Ind. 420, 12 N. E. 298; Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Edgerton, 125 Ind. 455, 25 N. E. 436.

If a special assessment is made, and there is no inquiry whether a benefit is conferred upon the property assessed equal to the assessment, such an assessment is arbitrary, unjust, and invalid because it is made on a rule which excludes any inquiry as to special benefits, and the necessary operation of which is, to the extent of the assessment above the benefit, to take property without compensation.

Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 197; Campbell v. Dwiggins, 83 Ind. 480; Parke County Coal Co. v. Campbell, 140 Ind. 28, 39 N. E. 149, 558.

A valid assessment cannot be made under an invalid law or ordinance.

An assessment must be made according to some prescribed rule, and not left to the unbridled discretion of a council or trustee.

Campbell v. Dwiggins, 83 Ind. 480; Sears v. Boston Street Comrs. 173 Mass. 350, 53 N. E. 877.

When an act of the legislature is independent and complete in itself it cannot be aided by incorporating into it that which is not there.

Campbell v. Dwiggins, 83 Ind. 480; Kuntz v. Sumption, 117 Ind. 1, 2 L. R. A. 655, 19 N. E. 474.

Assessments made under this law are made on the assumption that the property assessed is benefited in a sum equal to the amount of the assessment.

Keith v. Wilson, 145 Ind. 152, 44 N. E. 13; Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Edgerton, 125 Ind. 465, 25 N. E. 436; Terre Haute v. Mack, 139 Ind. 109, 38 N. E. 468.

If the assessment is based upon such an assumption, it is clear that it is made under a rule which excludes any inquiry as to the special benefits received by the property assessed.

Messrs. Elliott, Elliott, & Littleton, Lisher & Chez, Wilson & Yarling, Nelson & Myers, and McConnel & Jenkins for appellee.

Hadley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant brought this suit to restrain appellee from improving a street on which he 49 L. R. A.

owned an abutting lot. Shelbyville has less than 10,000 inhabitants, and the proceedings for the proposed improvement were instituted under the statute commonly known as the "Barrett Law" (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 4288-4298; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, §§ 6771-6780). On August 2, 1898, the common council, without any petition from the owners of the property affected, passed a resolution declaring a necessity for the improvement, the same to be executed as follows: "There shall be set and erected a curb of oolitic stone 4 inches thick, 20 inches wide, and not less than 5 feet in length, to be set 23 feet from the lot line outward, set to grade, set on a good bed of sand 4 inches thick, and to be dressed so that, when set and completed, the part of curbing that is exposed will show as dressed; the joints all to fit neat and smooth, and make close connection; and the space between the brick sidewalk on said part of said street shall be filled with good, rich dirt, and properly graded and made smooth, and when grade is made to be covered with good, live, fresh sod, to be on grade with the curbing and the brick sidewalk; . . . and that the cost and expense thereof, including advertising, labor, and material for the same, be assessed against the property on the line and collected according to the provisions of an act of the general assembly of the state of Indiana approved March 8, 1889, and amendments thereto;" and that notice should be given by publication that the common council, on August 30, 1898, at their chamber, would receive sealed proposals for the execution of the work, and would hear property owners' objections to the necessity for the construction thereof. On August 26, 1898, appellant filed his complaint, stating the foregoing facts, and alleging that the street to be improved is 100 feet wide, and the proposed widening of the sidewalks to 22 feet on each side will reduce the roadway to about 55 feet; that the making of said improvement will cost about $1 per lineal foot, which it is proposed the abutting property owners shall pay; that it will inconvenience the plaintiff and other property owners, and make their property less valuable, because of the inconvenience in getting to and from the traveled roadway; that it will be of no benefit to the plaintiff, and damage him $100. The sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint for want of facts is the only error assigned.

Counsel, in the introduction of their respective briefs, epigrammatically state the principal issue in this court thus: "Is the 'Barrett Law' law?" "The 'Barrett Law' is law." "The 'Barrett Law' is not law."

We will not stop now to inquire whether the demurrer to the complaint should have been overruled for a minor cause, since the appellant, as indicated by his argument, has based his appeal principally upon the question of the statute's constitutionality, and for the present the complaint will be taken as admitting that the city intends to proceed in accordance with the provisions of the statute. Appellant's contention is that the statute, in violation of the Federal and state Constitution, provides for the taking of property without just compensation, and without due process of law. Two propositions are involved: (1) Is the method of assessing the whole cost of a street improvement upon the abutting property equally by the frontage, irrespective of accruing benefits and damages, constitutional? (2) Is that the method required by the Barrett law?

Many of the courts of this country have answered the first question in the affirmative. Cooley, Tax'n, 2d ed. 1886, p. 644, says: "In many instances, where streets were to be opened or improved, sewers constructed, water pipes laid, or other improvements entered upon, the benefits of which might be expected to diffuse themselves along the line of the improvement in a degree bearing some proportion to the frontage, the legislature has deemed it right and proper to take the line of frontage as the most practicable and reasonable measure of probable benefits, and, making that the standard, to apportion the benefits accordingly. Such a measure of apportionment seems, at first blush, to be perfectly arbitrary, and likely to operate in some cases with great injustice; but it cannot be denied that, in the case of some improvements, frontage is a very reasonable measure of benefits,—much more just than value could be,—and perhaps approaching equality as nearly as any estimate of benefits made by the judgment of men. However this may be, the authorities are well united in the conclusion that frontage may lawfully be made the basis of apportionment."

In his treatise on Municipal Corporations, published in 1890, Dillon gives an extended review of the subject, and notes that the courts are very generally agreed that the authority to require property specially benefited to bear the expense of local improvements is embraced within the taxing power, and that a statute authorizing municipal authorities to make such improvements, and assess the cost in proportion to the frontage, in the absence of some special constitutional restriction, is a valid exercise of the power of taxation, and, according to the weight of authority, is considered to be a question of legislative expediency. Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 752-761. And, as upholding the doctrine of the majority, the author notes (§ 760) that the Supreme Court of the United States holds that state laws imposing upon property, according to legislative discretion, the cost of local improvements, do not deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, within the meaning of the 14th Amendment. Davidson v. New Orleans (1877) 96 U. S. 97, 104, 24 L. ed. 616; Mobile County v. Kimball (1880) 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108 (1883) 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663; Wurtz v. Hoagland (1884) 114 U. S. 606, 29 L. ed. 229, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1086; Walston v. Nevin (1888) 128 U. S. 578, 32 L. ed. 544, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192. To which may be added Spencer v. Merchant (1887) 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921; Williams v. Eggleston (1898) 170 U. S. 304, 311, 42 L. ed. 1047, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617; Parsons v. District of Columbia (1898) 170 U. S. 45, 42 L. ed. 943, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 521. The author, however, after considering many cases pro and con, and summing up the general principles underlying special assessments in his eighth conclusion (§ 761), affirms what he conceives to be the only true rule upon principle, as follows: "Whether it is competent for the legislature to declare that no part of the expense of a local improvement of a public nature shall be borne by a general tax, and that the whole of it shall be assessed upon the abutting property and other property in the vicinity of the improvement, thus for itself conclusively determining, not only that such property is specially benefited, but that it is thus benefited to the extent of the cost of the improvement, and then to provide for the apportionment of the amount by an estimate to be made by designated boards or officers, or by frontage or superficial area, is a question upon which the courts are not agreed. Almost all of the earlier cases asserted that the legislative discretion in the apportionment of public burdens extended this far, and such legislation is still upheld in most of the states. But since the period when express provisions have been made in many of the state Constitutions, requiring uniformity and equality of taxation, several courts of great respectability, either by force of this requirement or in the spirit of it, and perceiving that special benefits actually received by each parcel of contributing property was the only principle upon which such assessments can justly rest, and that any other rule is unequal, oppressive, and arbitrary, have denied the unlimited scope of legislative discretion and power, and asserted what must, upon principle, be regarded as the just and reasonable doctrine, that the cost of a local improvement can be assessed upon particular property only to the extent that it is specially and peculiarly benefited, and since the excess beyond that is a benefit to the municipality at large, it must be borne by the general treasury."

Among the many cases cited by the author in support of his conclusion is Tide-Water Co. v. Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 518, 90 Am. Dec. 634, where it is said, on page 527, Am. Dec. p. 641: "Where lands are improved by legislative action, on the ground of public utility, the cost of such improvement, it has been frequently held, may, to a certain degree, be imposed on the parties who, in consequence of owning lands in the vicinity of such improvement, receive a peculiar advantage. By the operation of such a system, it is not considered that the property of the individual, or any part of it, is taken from him for the public use, because he is compensated in the enhanced value of such property. But it is clear this principle is only applicable when the benefit is commensurate to the burthen; when that which is received by the landowner is equal or superior in value to the sum exacted; for, if the sum exacted be in excess, then to that extent, most incontestably, private property is assumed by the public. Nor as to this excess can it be successfully maintained that such imposition is legitimate as an exercise of the power of taxation. Such an imposition has none of the essential characteristics of a tax. We are to bear in mind that this projected improvement is to be regarded as one in which the public has an interest. The owners of these waste lands have a special concern in such improvement, so far as their lands will be in a peculiar manner benefited; beyond this, their situation is the same as that of the rest of the community. The consideration for the excess of the cost of the improvement over the enhancement of the property, within the operation of this act, is the public benefit. How, then, upon any principle of taxation . . . can this portion of the expense be thrown exclusively upon certain individuals? The expenditure of this portion of the cost of the work can only be justified on the ground of benefit to the public. I am aware of no principle which will permit the expenses incurred in conferring such benefit upon the public to be laid in the form of a tax upon certain persons, who are designated, not, indeed, by name, but by their description, as the owners of certain lands."

In the recent case of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 289, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187, filed December 12, 1898, the Supreme Court of the United States seems to have abandoned its former rulings, and to have adopted what Dillon announces as the only true rule upon principle. In that case the court said: "The particular question presented for consideration involves the validity of an ordinance of that village [Norwood], assessing upon the appellees' land abutting on each side of the new street an amount covering, not simply a sum equal to that paid for the land taken for the street, but in addition the cost and expenses connected with the condemnation proceedings." And: "The present appeal is prosecuted directly to this court, because the case involves the construction and application of the Constitution of the United States." Under a statute of Ohio, the council was authorized to assess the cost and expenses of street improvement "by the front foot of the property bounding and abutting upon the improvement." Rev. Stat. § 2264. Under this statute the village passed an ordinance providing that all costs and expenses of the condemnation and opening proceedings should be assessed "per foot front upon the property bounding and abutting on that part of Ivenho avenue as condemned and appropriated herein." The real question presented by the facts is thus stated by the court: "Does the exclusion of benefits from the estimate of compensation to be made for the property actually taken for public use authorize the public to charge upon the abutting property the sum paid for it, together with the entire costs incurred in the condemnation proceedings, irrespective of the question whether the property was benefited by the opening of the street?" In answering the question the court says: "The power of the legislature in these matters is not unlimited. There is a point beyond which the legislative department, even when exerting the power of taxation, may not go consistently with the citizen's right of property. As already indicated, the principle underlying special assessments to meet the cost of public improvements is that the property upon which they are imposed is peculiarly benefited, and therefore the owners do not in fact pay anything in excess of what they receive by reason of such improvement. But the guaranties for the protection of private property would be seriously impaired, if it were established as a rule of constitutional law that the imposition by the legislature upon particular private property of the entire cost of a public improvement, irrespective of any peculiar benefits accruing to the owner from such improvement, could not be questioned by him in the courts of the country. It is one thing for the legislature to prescribe it as a general rule that property abutting on a street opened by the public shall be deemed to have been specially benefited by such improvement, and therefore should specially contribute to the cost incurred by the public. It is quite a different thing to lay it down as an absolute rule that such property, whether it is in fact benefited or not by the opening of the street, may be assessed by the front foot for a fixed sum representing the whole cost of the improvement, and without any right in the property owner to show, when an assessment of that kind is made or is about to be made, that the sum so fixed is in excess of the benefits received. In our judgment, the exaction from the owner of private property of the cost of a public improvement in substantial excess of the special benefits accruing to him is, to the extent of such excess, a taking, under the guise of taxation, of private property for public use without compensation." After reviewing many authorities, and italicizing what Dillon affirms as the true rule, the court concludes: "It thus appears that the statute authorizes a special assessment upon the bounding and abutting property by the front foot for the entire cost and expense of the improvement, without taking special benefits into account. And that was the method pursued by the village of Norwood. The corporation manifestly proceeded upon the theory that the abutting property could be made to bear the whole cost of the improvement, whether such property was benefited or not to the extent of such cost." And further: "As the pleadings show, the village proceeded upon the theory, justified by the words of the statute, that the entire cost incurred in opening the street, including the value of the property appropriated, could, when the assessment was by the front foot, be put upon the abutting property, irrespective of special benefits. The assessment was by the front foot, and for a specific sum representing such cost, and that sum could not have been reduced under the ordinance of the village, even if proof had been made that the costs and expenses assessed upon the abutting property exceeded the special benefits. The assessment was in itself an illegal one, because it rested upon a basis that excluded any consideration of benefits. A decree enjoining the whole assessment was therefore the only appropriate one." Again: "The present case is one of illegal assessment under a rule or system which, as we have stated, violated the Constitution, in that the entire cost of the street improvement was imposed upon the abutting property by the front foot, without any reference to special benefits." An assessment for such improvement, to be in conformity with the opinion, is thus stated: "That, while abutting property may be specially assessed on account of the expense attending the opening of a public street in front of it, such assessment must be measured or limited by the special benefits accruing to it, that is, by benefits that are not shared by the general public; and that taxation of the abutting property for any substantial excess of such expense over special benefits will, to the extent of such excess, be a taking of private property for public use without compensation." The final judgment of the court follows: "The judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed, upon the ground that the assessment against the plaintiff's abutting property was under a rule which excluded any inquiry as to special benefits, and the necessary operation of which was, to the extent of the excess of the cost of opening the street in question over any special benefits accruing to the abutting property therefrom, to take private property for public use without compensation."

While the facts in the Norwood-Baker Case are unusual and distinguishable from the facts in the case at bar, yet it cannot be successfully denied that the general doctrine laid down is to the effect that the imposition of assessments for local improvements per front foot, irrespective of the question of accruing benefits, is in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution; and that the case has been so construed generally by the courts of the country, see Loeb v. Columbia Twp. (Jan. 9, 1899) 91 Fed. Rep. 37, involving the validity of assessments laid by a township upon abutting property for the improvement of a road; Fay v. Springfield (May 9, 1899) 94 Fed. Rep. 409, street-paving assessments against abutters; Sears v. Boston Street Comrs. (May 18, 1899) 173 Mass. 350, 53 N. E. 876, sewer assessments upon a particular class of property; Hutcheson v. Storrie (June 19, 1899) 92 Tex. 685, 45 L. R. A. 289, 51 S. W. 848, street-paving assessments upon abutting property; Schroder v. Overman (Oct. 24, 1899) 61 Ohio St. 1, 47 L. R. A. 156, 55 N. E. 158, street-pavement and sewer assessments against abutters; Charles v. Marion (Dec. 11, 1899) 98 Fed. Rep. 166, street-paving assessments against abutters.

The judgment of the Federal Supreme Court defining the limits of legislative power, sanctioned by the Federal Constitution, is the supreme law of the land. It commands state courts as well as state legislatures. The duty thus imposed is agreeable, as being in accord with our sense of just principles, and as furnishing the only reasonable foundation for the exercise of the taxing power in respect to special assessments.

Streets are public highways, which all inhabitants of the municipality have an equal right to use, and by the improvement of which all are in a measure benefited. There is much justice in holding that a sum equal to the special benefits—that is, such benefits as are not shared by the citizens generally—conferred upon the abutters may be exacted for application to the costs of the improvement; for, when the corporation takes only so much as it returns in the way of enhanced values and increased personal comfort, the property owner is not injured, but when he has thus contributed his special benefits as to the remainder of the costs he stands as any other citizen. This remainder represents the price to the public for its general benefits, and when exacted from the abutters is but the taxation of a class for public benefit, and clearly a taking of property for public use without just compensation.

We conclude, therefore, that the principles applicable to assessments for local improvements are these: The legislature may create, or authorize a municipality to create, a local taxing district for local-improvement purposes, which includes part only of the property within the municipality. The legislature may declare conclusively that only the property within the taxing district shall be specially assessed on account of local improvement within that district. Each parcel of contributing property may be assessed only to the extent that it actually receives special benefits. The taxing district, as a whole, may be assessed only to the extent of the sum of the special benefits actually received by the several parcels of contributing property. The improvement, so far as its cost exceeds the special benefits resulting to the several parcels of property in the taxing district, is a benefit to the municipality at large, and such excess must be borne by the general treasury. Property owners affected by an improvement within a taxing district are entitled to a hearing on the question of special benefits.

It remains to be seen if the Barrett law denies any of these principles. Whether the answer shall be for the appellant or the appellee depends upon two considerations, namely: (1) Does the Barrett law require that the costs of street and alley improvements shall be assessed against abutting property by the front-foot rule, without regard to the question of resulting benefits? (2) Do the provisions of the Barrett law supply to affected property owners "due process of law," within the meaning of the state and Federal Constitutions?

In arriving at the true interpretation of the statute, it is useful for us to review the legislative and judicial history of the state and county prior to the enactment of the Barrett law, in 1889. Dillon and Cooley class Indiana as one of the majority states upholding the doctrine that it is competent for the legislature to conclusively declare that the total cost of a local improvement shall be assessed equally against the frontage, and such classification was not without warrant. In 1852 the right to confer authority upon municipal officers to so provide for street and other improvements was first asserted by the legislature in a general law. Rev. Stat. 1852, p. 217. It was reasserted in 1857 (Acts 1857, p. 53), and again in 1865 (Acts 1865, Special Sess. p. 29), and again in 1867 (Acts 1867, p. 66), and again approved in 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 3163). The right to enforce such assessments was recognized by this court in 1861, Indianapolis v. Imberry, 17 Ind. 175, and in many subsequent decisions. The constitutionality of such legislation was never called in question until 1868, when it was assailed on the ground only that the same was in violation of the state Constitution requiring the rate of assessment and taxation to be uniform and equal. Such legislation was then and subsequently upheld as against such objection. Const. art. 10, § 1; Goodrich v. Winchester & D. Turnp. Co. 28 Ind. 119; Bright v. McCullough, 27 Ind. 223; Palmer v. Stumph, 29 Ind. 329; Law v. Madison, S. & G. Turnp. Co. 30 Ind. 77. But the constitutional question of due process of law and the taking of property for public use without compensation in the making of local improvements, within the meaning of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, seems never to have been previously considered by this court, so far as we have observed. Hence no ground exists to justify the insistence that the determination by this court, under former street-improvement laws, of the constitutional question now involved, has been carried into the enactment of the statute in controversy.

It should be noted that prior to 1889 no provision was found in any of the laws entitling property owners to a voice upon the necessity for the improvement, or to a hearing of any kind upon the acts of the assessing officers, or to be heard upon any subject touching the improvement, until after the issuance of a precept for the sale of their property for the payment of the assessment, and then only as to the regularity of the proceedings subsequent to the making of the contract for the improvement. As the law had stood for thirty-seven years, when the Barrett law came up for consideration in the assembly of 1889, municipal officers had the power, with a two-thirds vote of the council, to order an improvement, however costly and however unnecessary and oppressive, without regard to the wishes of the citizens, and proceed to charge the abutters with the total cost by the frontage rule, irrespective of any consideration of benefits, and thus, in some instances, impose upon the citizens an absolute confiscation of property without any form of hearing in its defense, further than to require it to be done orderly and according to prescribed rule. For some reasons the people had become dissatisfied with the law as it existed upon the subject. In what respects may be best judged from the character of the changes that were made. It is evident that the discontent did not arise from the method of frontage assessments, as a rule; for that principle had been consistently maintained in every enactment since 1852, and was carried into the Barrett law. Besides, in most cases, the rule is as just and equitable as any that may be devised. In the light of thirty-seven years' experience, however, it was doubtless manifest to the lawmakers that in some instances municipal officers, by reckless and inconsiderate acts, without testing public opinion, had involved citizens in heavy and unnecessary burdens by improvements, and that it was to them equally clear that all property bordering upon a municipal highway was not affected in the same way by an improvement of the latter; that in some cases the grade may be so raised or lowered as to most seriously impair the use and value of the property; in others, that some property may be situate upon a general level, highly improved, and in a business part of the city, while others upon the same street may be remote from business, lying low, and near a watercourse and practically worthless for business or residential purposes; in others, some abutting lots may be 20 feet, and others 200 feet deep. It seems, therefore, reasonable to presume that the mischiefs resulting from the acts of reckless officials, and the common, but exceptional, cases of injustice and hardship flowing from the uniform and rigid application of the front-foot rule, were brought to the attention of the legislature, and that their avoidance was a purpose entering into the structure of the new law. Quill v. Indianapolis, 124 Ind. 292, 295, 7 L. R. A. 681, 23 N. E. 788. This much is certain, that for reasons deemed sufficient new and important provisions were incorporated into the new law,—provisions contained in no previous law upon the subject.

The first of these is § 2, p. 237, Acts 1889 (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 4289), and is as follows: "Whenever cities or incorporated towns subject to the provisions of this act shall deem it necessary to construct any sewer, or make any of the alley or street improvements in this act mentioned, the council or board of trustees shall declare by resolution the necessity therefor, and shall state the kind, size, location, and designate the terminal points thereof, and notice for ten days of the passage of such resolution shall be given for two weeks in some newspaper of general circulation published in such city or incorporated town, if any there be, and if there be not such paper, then in some such paper printed and published in the county in which such city or incorporated town is located. Said notice shall state the time and place when and where the property owners along the line of said proposed improvement can make objections to the necessity for the construction thereof."

It is argued that this section affords the property owner no remedy beyond the right to advise the council with respect to the necessity for the improvement; and so it has been held by this court. Quill v. Indianapolis, 124 Ind. 292, 7 L. R. A. 681, 23 N. E. 788. But it does not follow that no benefit is to flow to the property owner from the observance of this provision. Municipal officers are elective, and, as a rule, in dealing with corporation affairs, will give respectful heed to the popular judgment of their constituents. This provision removes all power from the common council to impose burdens upon private property unawares the owner. It requires public notice to be given of the character and location of the proposed improvement for twenty-four days from the first publication,—a length of time sufficient to develop public opinion advisedly; and at a fixed time and place, and before making a contract, the council shall hear those along the line upon the subject of the improvement; and it may reasonably be expected that if the property owners shall be able to show that there exists no necessity for such improvement, or that it will cost more than the accruing benefits, well-meaning officers will be controlled by such showing and advice, as readily as by the positive mandate of a statute. It was not intended by this section to deprive the common council of the power of ordering the improvement irrespective of the advice of the property owners, but its purpose is to provide, in all cases, that they shall act advisedly and with deliberation.

The second and most important new provision is found in §§ 6, 7, Acts 1889 (the latter section, as amended, Acts 1891, p. 324; Acts 1899, p. 631; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 4293, 4294), which follow:

"When any such improvement has been made and completed according to the terms of the contract therefor made, the common council of such city, or the board of trustees of such town, shall cause a final estimate of the total cost thereof to be made by the city or town engineer, and the common council of such city, or the board of trustees of such town shall require said city or town engineer to report to the common council of such city or the board of trustees of such town the following facts touching such improvement: First. The total cost of said improvement. Second. The average cost per running front foot of the whole length of that part of the street or alley so improved. Third. The name of each property owner on that part of the street or alley so improved. Fourth. The number of front feet owned by the respective property owners on that part of said street so improved. Fifth. The amount of such cost for improvement due upon each lot or parcel of ground bordering on said street or alley, which amount shall be ascertained and fixed by multiplying the average cost price per running front foot by the number of running front feet of the several lots or parcels of ground respectively. Sixth. The full description, together with the owner's name, of each lot or parcel of ground bordering on said street so improved. Seventh. In the case of the construction of a sewer, a description of each lot or parcel of lot benefited thereby, together with the owner's name and the fair proportion of the cost of such sewer according to the benefits conferred thereby, that should be assessed against such lot or part of a lot."

"Upon the filing of the report provided for in the last preceding section, the common council of such city, or the board of trustees of such town, shall give two weeks' notice in a newspaper printed and published in such city or incorporated town, if any there be, and if there be no such paper, then in a newspaper printed and published in the county in which such city or incorporated town is located, of the time and place when and where a hearing can be had upon such report, before a committee to be appointed to consider such reports, and such committees shall make report to the common council of said city, or the board of trustees of such town, recommending the adoption or alteration of such report, and the common council of such city or the board of trustees of such town may adopt, alter, or amend such report and the assessments therein. Any person feeling aggrieved by such report shall have the right to appear before such committees and the common council of such city or the board of trustees of such town, and make objections thereto, and shall be accorded a hearing thereon, and the common council of such city, or the board of trustees of such town, shall assess against the several lots or parcels of ground the several amounts which shall be assessed for and on account of such improvement."

It will be noted that § 6 provides that, after completion of the work, the engineer shall report certain facts to the council,—not make an assessment of the costs; that, when such report is lodged with the council, it shall give two weeks' public notice of a time and place when and where a hearing can be had upon the facts reported by the engineer, before a committee appointed by the council to consider such report, and such committee shall, after a consideration of the report, recommend to the council the adoption or alteration of the same. And any person feeling aggrieved by such report shall have the right to appear before the committee, and present objections thereto, and shall be accorded a hearing thereon, and the further right to carry his objections to the common council, where he shall also be accorded a hearing. After the hearings and objections are disposed of, the common council may adopt, alter, or amend the report and the assessments thereon, "and shall assess against the several lots or parcels of ground the several amounts which shall be assessed for and on account of such improvement."

It is contended that the statute limits the hearing before the committee and common council to errors of the engineer in stating the facts required of him, and that the power of the council, with respect to the report, is exhausted when it has verified such facts. We are unable to approve such construction. Section 6 requires that the engineer shall report certain facts to the council; that is to say, report such facts correctly. Nothing short of a correct report is a compliance with the statute. We must view the subject as if the lawmakers assumed that the engineer would do his duty, and that when he submitted his report to the council, it accurately stated the facts required of him. Besides, will it be seriously contended that if, by inadvertence, errors crept into the report, the engineer, or even the council, at any time before final action thereon, did not have full power to correct it? Ball v. Balfe, 41 Ind. 221, 225. What reason, then, could there be for the legislature to deem it expedient to provide express authority in the council to correct, or cause to be corrected, errors in a report where none were reasonably supposed to exist, and where the power of correction would exist by irresistible implication? We may not attribute insincerity and dissembling to the legislators. We must believe that they meant something by these provisions beyond that granted by the old law, or why change it? The old law had been found efficient, and authorized by the Constitution.

In the search for legislative intent, "the court will look to each and every part of the statute; to the circumstances under which it was enacted; to the old law upon the subject, if any; to other statutes upon the same subject, or relative subjects, whether in force or repealed; to contemporaneous legislative history; and to the evils and mischiefs to be remedied." Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Edgerton, 125 Ind. 455, 460, 25 N. E. 437; Reynolds v. Bowen, 138 Ind. 434, 449, 36 N. E. 756, 37 N. E. 962; Goodwin v. State ex rel. Foley, 142 Ind. 117, 121, 41 N. E. 359. The common council shall give two weeks' notice of a time and place when their committee shall consider the report and hear grievances. In drainage and other assessment proceedings, it is provided that the commissioners shall inquire into certain facts, assess benefits and damages, and "make report to the court, and the court shall fix a time for hearing the report," and, after ten days' notice of the filing thereof, those affected by the report may appear and remonstrate. Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 5624, 5625.

Is it even doubtful that the consideration of the report required of the committee, and the hearing they shall give thereon, relate to any other subject than the proposed assessments or allotments of the cost of the improvement? After such hearing and consideration, the committee is required to report their recommendations to the common council, and the council, being thus advised, and upon further hearing of objections, may adopt the report as made by the engineer, distributing the total cost equally per front foot, or it may alter the report and the assessments therein; and, when the conclusion of the council is reached, it shall assess against the several lots and parcels of ground the several amounts which shall be assessed on account of such improvement. The mandate of the statute, following the hearings that the council shall assess the several amounts against the several parcels, clearly indicates the particular subject to be previously considered by the council and its committee. From the term "hearing" is necessarily implied the power to administer some adequate remedy. The council may alter the assessments; that is, as indicated by the engineer's report on the front-foot rule. "Alter" is to "make otherwise." Webster, Int. Dict.

From these considerations, we are unable to resist the conclusion that, upon the hearing provided in § 7, the common council have power to change assessments from the frontage rule in such cases as they may deem just. That the legislature may confer upon municipal officers the power to adjust special benefits accruing from such improvements to a fair and just basis is well settled (Garvin v. Dausman, 114 Ind. 429, 435, 16 N. E. 826; Kizer v. Winchester, 141 Ind. 694, 696, 40 N. E. 265); and the speedy and ample remedy afforded by this view of the statute is consistent with the spirit of the act and the nature of such improvement, which public convenience requires to be accomplished in the shortest practical period. As said in the Dausman Case, 114 Ind. 436, 16 N. E. 830: "It is essential to the public good that the necessity for street and other public improvements, and the cost of making them, and such other proceedings as are necessary to insure the prompt execution of the work, be determined and taken in a comparatively summary way." An "assessment" is the "adjusting the shares of a contribution by several towards a common beneficial object, according to the benefit received." Bouvier, Law Dict.; Anderson, Law Dict. From the power to alter is necessarily implied the power to add to or diminish. The absence of an express rule for guidance in the exercise of the power to alter does not impair it. It is sufficient if the power to change the assessment from the frontage rule exists. "It is a well-affirmed principle that, where a power is conferred by a statute, everything necessary to carry out the purpose of the power conferred and make it effectual and complete, will be implied." Conn v. Cass County Comrs. 151 Ind. 517, 525, 51 N. E. 1064; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 340, 341. Such implied power, however, will not authorize the employment of means and methods which may spring from the whims and caprices of administrative officers, according to the varying circumstances, but will only permit the use of such reasonable, uniform, and consistent modes and measures as are calculated to accomplish the purpose in the spirit designed. How the power may be exercised in this instance must be determined from the spirit and scope of the whole act, of which said § 7 is a part, as aided by the spirit and principle running through other legislation upon the same and kindred subjects. Id. § 288. In an act relating to the opening and improvement of streets (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3633; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 3170; Horner's Rev. Stat. § 3170), commissioners are commanded to make assessments on the basis of actual benefits. The same rule is required in drainage and free gravel-road proceedings (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 5658; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4288; Horner's Rev. Stat. § 4288, Acts 1869, p. 74); and this court has consistently held for thirty years that special benefits are the only foundation for special assessments (New Albany v. Cook, 29 Ind. 220; Ross v. Stackhouse, 114 Ind. 200, 16 N. E. 501; Quill v. Indianapolis, 124 Ind. 292, 7 L. R. A. 681, 23 N. E. 788; Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Edgerton, 125 Ind. 455, 465, 25 N. E. 436).

The published notice calls attention of all persons affected that the report of the engineer is before the council for consideration, and that the same is subject to such alteration as the council may deem just in adjusting the several assessments to the basis of actual benefits, and all persons concerned are bound to know that the prima facie assessments against their property are liable to be increased as well as decreased. That this court, prior to 1889, supported the doctrine that the legislature had constitutional sanction to declare, as matter of law, that the special benefits to a particular district, by an improvement, were equally received by bordering property, and equal to the total cost, had little force as an argument. The answer to it is that the injustice and hardship resulting from the doctrine were potential in securing legislative action for the amelioration of the rule. We think it evident that the assembly of 1889 determined upon a modification of the old rule, so far as it required an equal distribution of the cost of an improvement, on all bordering property, without regard to the question of actual benefits. Not that the rule offended either the Federal or state Constitution as then interpreted by the Federal and state courts (for no question of that character had been raised in this state), but because it was required by the simplest principles of justice. That act of 1889 may be tested by the usual canons of construction, and if from these it appears that the assembly took cognizance of the mischiefs resulting from the old law, and provided a remedy in advance of constitutional requirement, the legislature is not to be discredited by the fact that the courts have come to restrict the constitutional limitations to the bounds set by the statute. The important inquiry is, Is the statute, as enacted in 1889 and as it now stands, antagonistic to any of the principles of the Federal Constitution as now construed by the United States Supreme Court? 49 L. R. A.

Section 3 provides: "In all contracts specified in the preceding section, the cost of any street or alley improvement shall be estimated [not assessed], according to the whole length of the street or alley or part thereof to be improved, per running foot, . . . and the city or incorporated town shall be liable to the contractor for the contract price of said improvement, and the owners of lots or parts of lots bordering on such street or alley or part thereof to be improved, . . . shall be liable to the city for their proportion of the costs in the ratio of the front line of the lots owned by them, to the whole improved line for street and alley improvements, . . . and the city or incorporated town shall have a lien upon such lots or parts of lots respectively from the time such improvement is ordered for such costs of improvement, collectable as hereinafter provided. . . . Such city or town shall be liable and pay for all that part of such street or alley improvement as shall be occupied by the street or alley crossings and may order that any part of the total cost of any of the improvements in this act mentioned shall be paid out of the general fund."

The gist of these provisions is that, in providing for the payment for an improvement, the expense of it shall be estimated—that is, calculated—by the running foot; the city or town shall be liable to the contractor for the full contract price, and to reimburse it the owners of lots shall be liable to the city or town for their legal proportion of the cost in the ratio of their several frontage to the whole frontage of the improvement, which liability shall constitute a lien upon abutting property in favor of the city or town from the time such improvement is ordered.

Three things may be noted in these provisions: (1) That the cost shall be estimated by the running foot, not so assessed; (2) that the liability shall relate to the frontage; and (3) that the liability and lien shall arise and attach at the time the improvement is ordered. There is nowhere to be found a mandate that the cost shall be assessed by the frontage rule, or that property shall ultimately be required to contribute equally per front foot. The measure of liability and lien here mentioned are only conjectured at most, since they arise before an ascertainment of the facts, by measurement, necessary to their definite determination. The provision can only mean that the liability and lien, when definitely ascertained by the report of the engineer, as required by § 6, as reviewed and adjudged by the common council, as required by § 7, shall relate back to the time of ordering the improvement.

If we read § 3 as providing a fixed rule of assessments, as contended, the effect is to render § 7 meaningless and nugatory; for it clearly follows that, if the rule of assessments is unalterably fixed by § 3, the hearing provided for in § 7 is nothing more than a cunningly devised illusion, which expressly provides that the aggrieved property owners shall have the right to present their grievance to a tribunal that has no power to grant relief. This is mockery, pure and simple, and implies insincerity and dissimulation in the lawmakers, which we cannot indulge. On the other hand, if we read § 3 as providing a basis for assessments which shall be prima facie correct, and which shall be held to be the true and correct assessments until assailed by the property owner, and shown upon a hearing by a preponderance of proof or found to be unjust and altered and amended by the common council of its own motion, then we find §§ 3, 6, and 7 in complete harmony, each effective and in accord with the other provisions of the act. The intention is to be ascertained by considering the entire statute; and we must proceed as we would with any other composition, construing it with reference to the leading idea and purpose of the whole instrument. The general intent is the polar star by which the meaning of any part is to be determined with a view to harmonizing the entire act. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 239. We therefore conclude that § 3, Acts 1889 (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 4290), must be construed as providing a rule of prima facie assessments in street and alley improvements, which allotments by the city or town engineer, under § 6 of said act of 1889 (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 4293), are subject to review and alteration by the common council and board of trustees, under § 7 of said act of 1889, as amended (Acts 1891, p. 324; Acts 1899, p. 64; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 4294), upon the basis of actual special benefits received by the improvement; and that under said § 7 the common council of a city or board of trustees of an incorporated town have not only the power, but it is their imperative duty, to adjust the assessments for street and alley improvements, under said act, to conform to the actual special benefits accruing to each of the abutting property owners.

The further question is propounded: If, in adjusting assessments to actual special benefits received, it shall be found that the total cost of the improvement exceeds the total sum of special benefits accruing therefrom, what provision is made for the excess of cost? It is quite clear that the common council or board of trustees have no power to impair the obligation of contracts, and that some provision must be made for full payment of the contract price for the improvement. Section 5 of said act (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 4292) reads as follows: ". . . The common council of such city or board of trustees of such town, with the concurrence of two thirds of the members thereof, may order or cause any or all of the improvements mentioned in the first section of this act, and repairs of any kind of streets and alleys to be made in like manner, without such petition, and either charge and cause any or all of the expenses thereof to be assessed, as hereinafter provided, when petition is made, or if it is deemed just and right by the common council of such city or the board of trustees of such town to cause such expenses, or any part thereof, to be paid out of the general revenue of the city or incorporated town." Here is a new power granted the common council and board of trustees to order, by a two-thirds vote, any improvement as fully as they could do upon a petition, as provided by § 1; and, when the body chooses to exercise this power, it may elect between three schemes in providing payment for street and alley improvements. It may either charge the whole expense against the general revenues of the city or town, or it may charge a part against the general revenues, and a part against the abutting property, or it may charge all the expense of such improvement against the abutting property, upon the presumption, which it may for the time indulge, that the aggregate special benefits accruing therefrom will be equal to the total expenses; but it must take notice, when it decides to charge the abutting property, that the expenses shall be assessed "as hereinafter provided" in §§ 6 and 7, which, as we have seen, must be done upon the basis of actual special benefits received.

Section 3 provides that "the city or incorporated town shall be liable to the contractor for the contract price of said improvement," and when a city or town enters into a contract, under the scheme of requiring the abutters to contribute to the cost to the extent of their special benefits, the corporation is bound to know that if it shall be found, upon the hearing provided in § 7, that the accruing special benefits are inadequate to pay the expenses of the improvement, the deficit must be provided for from the general revenues of the city or town. The question of deficit cannot be determined until the common council has concluded its hearing and made the assessments. At this stage, the improvement has been completed, and the contractor entitled to his pay. It is then too late to halt or retreat. No course is then open to the corporation but to go forward, and put into exercise the power conferred by § 3, and order the deficit paid from the general treasury. The contingency of a deficit arises from the law, and enters into, and becomes a part of, the order for the improvement, and a part of the contract therefor, and is but a reasonable exercise of the continuing power to pay any part of the expenses from the general revenues when the fact arises that they cannot be fully met by the special benefits. The entering into a contract, under the scheme of requiring contribution from special benefits to the extent thereof, is an election between methods of payment, and, when once chosen and entered upon, the procedure thereunder, as fixed by the law, is as imperatively commanded as if no other existed. The insistence, therefore, that the law contains no mandate that the common council or board of trustees shall, in any event, pay any part of the expenses of such improvements from the general revenues, cannot be sustained.

We are aware that this court has held that, when the assessment scheme is pursued in making such improvements, the city or town assumes no primary liability, except for street and alley crossings; and what we here hold is that, as to a deficit only, if any, in special benefits to meet the cost of an improvement, the city or town sustains the same primary obligation imposed upon it for street and alley crossings. There is language used in Terre Haute v. Mack, 139 Ind. 99, 38 N. E. 468, and perhaps in other cases, in this and the appellate court, not necessary to the decision of any question presented by the record, that appears in conflict with what is here decided, but, in so far as such language may so appear, it is disapproved. The canons of construction compel the interpretation which we have given this act, and, so construed, it is not obnoxious to any provisions of the state or Federal Constitution, either under the Norwood-Baker Case or the earlier decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States or of this state.

It is proposed by the improvement which affects the appellant to reduce the roadway of the street from 70 to 56 feet in width, by an extension outward of the sidewalks from 15 to 22 feet. The sidewalks have heretofore, under corporation direction, been improved to a width of 15 feet from the lot lines, the first 10 feet paved with brick, and the balance to the curb graded and sodded; and it will be noted, from the facts stated on the first page of this opinion, that a part of the proposed improvement consists of filling the space between the brick sidewalk and the new curb with "good, rich dirt," to be smoothed to a grade with the brick sidewalk and new curb, and covered "with good, live, fresh sod." The point is made that, conceding the constitutionality of the Barrett law, the ordinance is void for want of power in the common council, under the statute, to assess the cost of filling with rich dirt and sodding against the abutters. The first section of the act (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 4288) provides that the common council "may have the sidewalk graded and paved, or the whole width of the street graded and paved," under the provisions of the act. It may well be doubted if the authority here conferred can be extended to grading with a particular quality of earth, designed, not for the permanency of the improvement, but to produce a luxuriant vegetable growth. We think the words "grading and paving" are employed in the statute in the sense that the surface of the ground shall be made to conform to a regular line by cutting and filling with any sort of dirt suitable to the maintenance of the grade, and which may be most cheaply obtained, and smoothly covering the same with some hard substance, with the single view to permanency and easy travel for footmen and vehicles.

It is probably true, though we do not so decide, that the common council, in their general dominion over the streets, have implied power to construct lawns, and otherwise decorate those parts of the street not necessary to public travel, at the expense of the general treasury; but when it seeks to exercise the taxing power, and to levy upon a particular class the cost of an improvement purely ornamental, it must be able to point to some express provision of the statute conferring the right. No power to tax will arise by implication. Doe ex dem. Lemon v. Chunn, 1 Blackf. 337, 338; Lafayette v. Cox, 5 Ind. 38; Slessman v. Crozier, 80 Ind. 487; Gallup v. Schmidt (Ind.) 56 N. E. 443. The council has express authority of law to require the planting of shade trees at the expense of the abutters (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3541, cl. 46; Horner's Rev. Stat. § 3106, cl. 46); but it cannot be said that this right carries with it the power to construct lawns or other decorations in the streets, and to enforce the cost thereof against the abutters. The power is, at least, doubtful, "and any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied." Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 89, Approved in Craufordsville v. Braden, 130 Ind. 149, 152, 14 L. R. A. 268, 28 N. E. 849; Williams v. Davidson, 43 Tex. 33; Corvallis v. Carlile, 10 Or. 139; Kirkham v. Russell, 76 Va. 956. We therefore hold that the ordinance, so far as it provided for the grading with rich dirt and sodding as a part of the proposed improvement, was void, as being ultra vires, and that the appellant was entitled to an injunction against so much of said proposed improvement. Equity will enjoin the exercise of an unauthorized power. Sackett v. New Albany, 88 Ind. 273, 45 Am. Rep. 467; Henry County Comrs. v. Gillies, 138 Ind. 667, 673, 38 N. E. 40; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 914.

If entitled to any part of the relief sought, the demurrer to the complaint should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

Baker, J., dissenting:

I regret my inability to agree with my brethren in their construction of the Barrett law. In stating my reasons, with all due deference, I think it proper first to determine accurately the question presented for solution. The Federal Constitution is not what the citizen may read it to be, but is what the Supreme Court of the United States declares it to be. I concur in the statement that, prior to the Norwood-Baker decision, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187, the method stated in Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 752, was constitutional; that is, that the legislature, in its discretion, might declare as a matter of law that the whole cost of a street improvement and the special benefits to abutting property equaled each other, and that the cost should be apportioned according to frontage, and that the property owners were entitled to a hearing before a tribunal authorized to review the assessment and see that it justly conformed to the frontage basis. For brevity, I shall call this the "old" Constitution. I concur in the statement that, since the Norwood-Baker decision, the method stated in § 752 of Dillon is unconstitutional, and that nothing short of the method stated in § 761 of Dillon is constitutional; that is, that the legislature must provide a method by which the special benefits to contributing property shall be determined as a question of fact, and that the excess of cost above the sum of special benefits is a general benefit, to be paid for from the general treasury, and that property owners are entitled to a hearing before a tribunal authorized to review the assessment, and see that it justly conforms to the basis of benefits in fact received. For brevity, I shall call this the "new" Constitution. The text-books and reports are full of the general statement that "the only basis for special assessments is special benefits." Concerning this proposition there has never been any disagreement, so far as I have been able to learn. But from this common starting point two very dissimilar lines of thought have been followed. In one it was said: "Special benefits are the only legitimate basis for special assessments, but the legislature may declare, as a matter of law, that the property owner's special benefits are exactly equal to his special assessment by frontage." In the other it was said: "Special benefits are the only legitimate basis for special assessments, but the property owner may not be specially assessed beyond his special benefits found as a matter of fact." So, finding in reported cases the expression that special benefits are the only legitimate basis for special assessments does not of itself show which theory a court has adopted. It is hardly conceivable that a court would be following out the two theories at the same time. They seem as far apart as the poles, as essentially different as a question of law is from a question of fact. A legislative act, it seems to me, must have some consistent theory underlying it. It cannot well be two different things at once. The legislature must have intended the one or the other,—not both. And though it is within the range of possibilities that the legislature in 1889 might have framed a law which would meet the requirements of the "new" Constitution of 1898, and which would be permissible under the "old," the question is, Which theory was it that the legislature intended to conform to in the Barrett law? Is it likely that, by prescience or by chance, the legislature hit upon the requirements of the "new" Constitution that were not in the "old?" Or, on the contrary, did the legislature intend to carry out the same policy, sanctioned by the judiciary, that had then been in operation for nearly forty years, with the addition of the bond feature?

Before proceeding with the question, it may be well to notice two lines of argument advanced by counsel for appellee, to which my brethren, perhaps unconsciously, may have accorded some weight. One is that this court must presume that the legislature intended its act to conform to the Constitution, and therefore this court, by intendment, should supply to the act whatever is needed to make it constitutional. The other is that the Supreme Court of the United States will follow any line of decision that this court may adopt. Whether or not this last statement is true is not within the province of this court to decide; and whether, if that were true, it is an argument addressed to the reason, or an appeal to what counsel may believe to be the prepossessions, of this court, is not worth while to consider. But counsel's first contention is of great importance. If the contention were correct, then this court and every court has committed a grievous wrong against an independent and co-ordinate branch of the government every time a statute has been held to be unconstitutional. But it seems to me such a process is not judicial construction. Judicial construction is not an unbridled force, operating this way in one case and that way in another, according to caprice, or what courts may think would be good legislative judgment. The function of judicial construction is, not to hold statutes constitutional, but to determine the meaning of statutes. If it is found that the legislature has acted within the scope of its powers, courts should let the act alone, whether they deem it wise or not. If it is found that the legislature has usurped power, and invaded the reserved rights of the people, it should be the duty of the courts rigorously and jealously to uphold the rights of the people even if they think the legislature ought to have the power it attempted to exercise. The first business of the courts is to ascertain judicially the meaning of the statute. Whether the statute is constitutional or unconstitutional cannot be determined until the meaning of the statute is first determined; and that meaning should be determined according to rules of law that the courts should uniformly follow. If courts recognize no rules in declaring the legislative intent, or disregard the lawful order of applying recognized rules, the people, the bar, and the inferior tribunals would have no means by which to make even a fair guess at what would finally be declared to be the law. If there is no law to control courts' interpretation of law, as well might there be no law at all. Non licet iudicibus de legibus judicare, sed secundum ipsas. But, if counsel were correct in the contention that the court should first examine the Constitution, and then, by construction, mold the statute to fit it, the argument, it seems to me, should operate against appellee, and not in its favor, for the Constitution that the members of the legislature of 1889 had sworn to support was the "old" Constitution. They may have had the prevision to see that a "new" one was coming, but they were not bound to frame their laws according to its fashion. Yet the impression remains with me that my brethren have first laid out the new pattern and then cut the old material to fit it.

The Barrett law is too lengthy to set out here in full. But, omitting such portions as are exhibited in the majority opinion, I shall endeavor to give the framework of the statute. The 1st section provides for the beginning of street improvement proceedings by the petition of property owners. The 2d section authorizes the common council to declare by ordinance the necessity for street improvements, and directs notice of the passage of such an ordinance to be given by publication. "Said notices shall state the time and place when and where the property owners along the line of said proposed improvement can make objections to the necessity for the construction thereof." This section does not purport to relate to the method of assessment, or to give property owners a hearing on any subject except the necessity of the proposed improvement; and, as the power to decide is left within the unqualified discretion of the council, the objections which property owners could make on the question of the necessity of the improvement would necessarily be advisory only. Accordingly, it is decided by this court that the common council may enter an order for the construction of the improvement before giving notice of the resolution of necessity. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Edgerton, 125 Ind. 455, 462, 25 N. E. 436. This being so, I am unable to perceive how § 2 has any application to the construction of the sections that point out the procedure after the construction of the work has been determined upon. The 3d section, omitting the part in reference to sewers, declares that "the cost of any street or alley improvement shall be estimated according to the whole length of the street or alley, or the part thereof to be improved, per running foot, . . . and the city or incorporated town shall be liable to the contractor for the contract price of said improvement, and the owners of lots or parts of lots bordering on such street or alley, or the part thereof to be improved, . . . shall be liable to the city for their proportion of the cost in the ratio of the front line of their lots owned by them to the whole improved line for street and alley improvements, . . . and the city or incorporated town shall have a lien upon such lots or parts of lots, respectively, from the time such improvement is ordered, for such costs of improvement, collectable as hereinafter provided, . . . and the owners of such unplatted lands bordering on such street or alley or part thereof to be improved shall be liable to the contractor for their proportion of the cost in the ratio of the front lines of such unplatted lands owned by them to the whole improved line; and in making the assessment against such owners for the improvement of such lots or parts of lots and unplatted lands [the cost] shall be assessed upon the ground fronting or immediately abutting on such improvement back to the distance of 150 feet from such front line, and the city or incorporated town and the contractor shall have a lien thereon for the value of such improvement. . . . Any mistake in the description of the property or in the name of the owner shall not vitiate the lien of such assessment. Such city or town shall be liable and pay for all that part of such street or alley improvement as shall be occupied by the street and alley crossings, and may order that any part of the total cost of any of the improvements in this act mentioned shall be paid out of the general fund." The 4th section provides for an allowance to the owner of any lot who, before the contract is let, has made any improvement in front of his lot in accordance with the general plan of improvement for his street, and provides for taking security from the contractor. The 5th section: "When any such contract shall be made, or shall have been heretofore made, and shall have been in progress of fulfillment, the common council . . . shall have power to cause estimates to be made from time to time of the amount of work done by the contractor, and to cause the same to be paid out of the treasury, deducting a reasonable amount of percentage to secure the completion of the contract until the whole shall be finished, and to prescribe the time in which the whole shall be completed, and such estimates shall be a lien upon the several parcels of ground upon which they are assessed to the same extent that taxes are a lien, and shall have the same preferences over other demands, and such liens shall be in favor of the city or incorporated town and the owners of the certificates or bonds hereinafter mentioned, to secure the city or incorporated town and such owners the reimbursement for such cost of improvement hereinafter provided for. The common council of such city or the board of trustees of such town, with the concurrence of two thirds of the members thereof, may order or cause any or all of the improvements mentioned in the 1st section of this act, and repairs of any kinds of streets and alleys to be made in like manner, without such petition, and either charge and cause any or all of the expenses thereof to be assessed and collected, as hereinafter provided, when petition is made, or if it is deemed just and right by the common council of such city or the board of trustees of such town, to cause such expenses, or any part thereof, to be paid out of the general revenue of the city or incorporated town." The 6th and 7th sections are set out in the majority opinion. The 8th section authorizes the issuance of improvement bonds, in anticipation of the collection of the assessments, for the payment of which bonds the lotowners provide the money in annual instalments, and commands that, after the assessment has been confirmed by the common council, "no suit shall lie to restrain or enjoin the collection of such assessment, and the validity of such assessment shall not be questioned, and such bonds, when issued, shall transfer to the owner thereof all the right and interest of such city or incorporated town in and to such assessments and the liens thereby created, with full power to enforce the collection thereof by foreclosure or otherwise, under any of the provisions of this act." The 9th section provides for the foreclosure of assessment liens, and transfers the city's interest in the liens to the holders of the bonds. The 10th section authorizes the collection of assessments by the city treasurer by sale upon precept, and allows the lotowners the right of appeal to the circuit court of the county, but "in case the court and jury shall find, upon trial, that the proceedings of said officers subsequent to said order directing the work to be done are regular, that a contract has been made, that the work has been done, in whole or in part, according to the contract, and that the estimate has been properly made thereon, then said court shall direct the property to be sold and conveyed by the sheriff thereof as the said treasurer is hereinafter directed to sell and convey property liable to street improvements." In regard to § 10, it is evident that, under any construction of § 7, the appeal from the precept has become nugatory; for, the assessments having been made conclusive on the hearing before the council, the property owner may not again contest what has been finally adjudicated. But § 10 is important in considering the changes made in street improvement proceedings by the Barrett law.

Now, the question being under which of the two inconsistent methods of laying assessments the legislature intended to act,—whether under the old Constitution, according to special benefits declared as a matter of law, or under the new, according to special benefits, to be determined by the assessing officers as a matter of fact,—the answer should require an examination of the whole statute in the light of the circumstances surrounding the legislators in 1889, in order to determine the entire scope and manifest intent of the act. And the first of these circumstances is the attitude of this court. For nearly forty years prior to 1889 street improvements were made in this state under laws that declared that the special benefits and the assessments by frontage for the entire cost, except for street and alley crossings, equaled each other; and this court uniformly held that such laws were in harmony with the old Constitution. In Snyder v. Rockport Trustees (May term, 1855) 6 Ind. 237, an act was assumed and declared to be constitutional that directed the town board, on petition of two thirds of the owners of abutting property, to assess the whole cost upon all abutting property and to apportion the cost according to the last assessed valuation of such property. In Goodrich v. Winchester & D. Turnp. Co. (May term, 1866) 26 Ind. 119, the constitutionality of a local assessment act, wherein the legislature had fixed the "special benefits" arbitrarily as a matter of law, was under consideration, and this court, among other things, said: "It is claimed that the assessment authorized by this statute is not a tax, not a burden or charge imposed by the legislative power of the state upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes, but the exercise of the power of eminent domain, in taking private property for public use 'without just compensation.' There is a manifest distinction between the taxing power and that of eminent domain. Both, in effect, appropriate private property to public uses. They differ only in degree. Taxation exacts money from individuals as their share of the public burdens, and the taxpayer, according to the theory of our system, receives a just compensation in the benefits conferred by the government in the proper application of the tax. When, however, property is appropriated by virtue of the right of eminent domain, it is taken, not as the owner's share of a public burden, but as so much more than his share. Many of our public improvements are local in their character, and confer special benefits on those in their immediate vicinity. By a long line of decisions of this court, these benefits may be set off against damages sustained by the appropriation of private property for public use in the construction of such works. In the case in judgment the legislature has determined—and this matter is within its power—that this is a proper subject for taxation, and that the burden imposed is the just share of each person embraced within the provisions of the act." In Palmer v. Stumph (May term, 1868) 29 Ind. 329, it was said: "By this act the rate is the same upon everyone within reach of the assessment; that is, the exact benefit each may receive from the improvement of the street. The legislature have adopted this method of reaching that result. It is certainly reasonable to suppose that, as a rule, property along the line of a street improved will be equally benefited; that, as a rule, the property fronting upon a street, foot by foot, will be of equal value, and should therefore be equally assessed." In Ray v. Jeffersonville (May term, 1883) 90 Ind. 567, an assessment under the street improvement law of 1881 was attacked on the ground that the act was in violation of § 21, art. 1, of our Constitution, which provides that "no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation;" and the court held the act valid as against that objection. This court, through Mitchell, Ch. J., in Ross v. Stackhouse (Nov. term, 1887) 114 Ind. 200, 16 N. E. 501, declared: "Special assessments for street and other similar improvements are upheld upon the theory that each lot or tract of land assessed is benefited in a special and peculiar manner in a sum equal to the amount estimated or assessed against it." Through the same judge, the court in Garvin v. Daussman (May 8, 1888) 114 Ind. 429, 16 N. E. 826, in speaking of the kind of notice and hearing that was thought to satisfy all constitutional requirements, said: "In the imposition of poll or occupation taxes, where a certain sum is assessed against each individual exercising a given avocation, or according to his age, without regard to actual benefits, the necessity of notice and a hearing is reduced to a minimum. To a measurable extent, the same principle is involved when the cost of an improvement is, as by law in proper cases it may be, apportioned by mere mathematical calculation, according to a certain rate per front foot. . . . The principle which underlies and upholds special assessments, such as that involved in the present case, is that the lands assessed are enhanced in value to an amount equal to the cost of the improvement, which is to be apportioned among those specially benefited in the manner prescribed by law. . . . It is essential to the public good that the necessity for street and other public improvements, and the cost of making them, and such other proceedings as are necessary to insure the prompt execution of the work, be determined and taken in a comparatively summary way. . . . If, therefore, the law provides for giving notice, and for a method whereby the property owner may ultimately challenge the correctness of the assessment made against his property, in respect to whether it was made in good faith, without intervening mistake or error, and according to the method and under the safeguards provided by the law—the constitutional provision is deemed to be satisfied."

Taking the foregoing as a fair illustration of the judicial history of the question down to 1889, I cannot agree in the statement that the constitutionality of the front-foot method had been considered only in reference to the provision requiring uniformity and equality in taxation, and never in reference to "just compensation" and "due process of law;" and I am unable to reconcile such a contention with the admission that Dillon and Cooley were not without warrant in classing Indiana "as one of the majority states upholding the doctrine that it is competent for the legislature conclusively to declare that the total cost of a local improvement shall be assessed equally against the frontage." The legislature of 1889 not only knew this judicial history, but also were aware that it was occasioned by a uniform and consistent course of legislation since 1852. Prior to 1889 the street improvement laws had been changed many times, and yet it is agreed that the underlying plan remained the same. In 1889 certain changes were made; and my brethren, if I understand them, state that the legislature intended to abandon the whole theory of local assessments under the "old" Constitution, and to adopt the theory of the "new." And this on account of the people's dissatisfaction with the law. But it is said that "it is evident that the discontent did not arise from the method of frontage assessments as a rule, for that principle had been consistently maintained in every enactment since 1852, and was carried into the Barrett law." The last declaration of this court on the subject of street improvements prior to the meeting of the legislature in January, 1889, was made in Garvin v. Dausman (May, 1888) 114 Ind. 429, 16 N. E. 826. In that case, as in some earlier ones, the constitutionality of the arbitrary front-foot method was upheld, not only in respect to "uniform and equal taxation," but also in respect to "just compensation" and "due process of law;" and the court then advised the legislature that "the determination of the common council . . . may be made conclusive."

. . . It is essential to the public good that the necessity for street and other public improvements, and the cost of making them, and such other proceedings as are necessary to insure the prompt execution of the work, be determined and taken in a comparatively summary way. In making up the Barrett law, the legislature did not strike out into new fields; but they took, as the foundation to work upon, the old street improvement statutes of this state, which are confessedly based upon the arbitrary front-foot method; and adopted from other states certain elements that stood as component parts of the arbitrary front-foot method. Compare Bates's Anno. Stat. (Ohio) 1899, §§ 2293a, 1-9, and §§ 2293b-2293d. Also N. Y. Laws 1870, chap. 619; N. Y. Laws 1881, chap. 689; N. Y. Laws 1884, chap. 510; N. Y. Laws 1885, chaps. 396, 406; N. Y. Laws 1893, chap. 550; N. Y. Laws 1895, chap. 816; and Spencer v. Merchant, 100 N. Y. 585, 3 N. E. 682; Jones v. Tonawanda, 158 N. Y. 438, 53 N. E. 280; Lyon v. Tonawanda, 98 Fed. Rep. 361. The new features that were not in our former statutes are the provisions for the resolution of necessity, for the issuance of bonds and the foreclosure of the liens represented thereby, for the laying of the assessments by the city engineer, and for the substitution of the common council for the circuit court as the tribunal whose judgment, after a "hearing," makes the assessments conclusive. As these features are well adapted to fit into the scheme of laying street assessments by the arbitrary front-foot method, and as such was their place in the legislative plans of Ohio and New York, and perhaps other states, it strikes me as a somewhat violent assumption to say that the legislature of 1889 must have intended, by the introduction of these provisions, to grant the property owners rights beyond those given by the "old" Constitution that was then in force, and to afford them the protection guaranteed by the "new" Constitution of 1898. The proper assumption would be that the legislature did not intend to depart from a long-settled policy, or to have the basis of assessment, which was brought forward from our former statutes, viewed in any other light than that of its settled construction. The new provisions, except § 6, do not purport to fix any rule for laying the assessments. Section 6 expressly makes frontage the basis for street assessments. So it is found that in the only new section which speaks of the method of assessment the same plan is apparent that inheres in the old matter which was re-enacted. And in no other way could § 6 have been harmonized with the former laws which were used as the foundation of the new. Yet on the word "hearing" in § 7 is hung a construction which, as it seems to me, conflicts, not only with the former laws, but also with the concurrently new matter in § 6. My brethren seem to have overlooked the consideration that in enacting the Barrett law the legislature may have found that the then existing statutes, which permitted the property owners separately and one at a time to contest in the circuit court the correctness of their assessments, did not afford a satisfactory basis for the issuance of bonds, and that the substitution thereof of a "hearing" before the common council, at which all objections could be disposed of together, furnished "a comparatively summary way" of rendering the assessments conclusive, as suggested in Garvin v. Daussman, 114 Ind. 429, 16 N. E. 826.

It seems to me that my brethren have acted upon the plan of first adopting a construction of § 7, and then construing the rest of the act (so far as it is set forth by them) in a way to conform thereto. I think this is not a proper method of interpretation; and I cannot, under the rules of construction as I understand them, find the meaning in § 7 that has been given to it. The language of the section furnishes no foundation for the construction adopted. It makes no allusion to special benefits. It fails to command the city to refrain from assessing upon the abutting lot an amount in excess of the special benefits actually received by it, and to refrain from assessing upon the property in the taxing district an amount in excess of the sum total of the special benefits actually received by the several parcels of contributing property. It fails to command the city to pay from the general treasury the excess of cost above the total special benefits,—the part that benefits only the municipality at large. Benefits and damages are the varying degrees above and below zero on the compensation scale. If a lotowner's special benefits were below zero, from what source, and by what method, is he to make even? The section fails to provide. These omitted matters might have been fully and explicitly supplied by the legislature by tacking them onto the word "hearing," but it did not do so. My brethren say that "from the term 'hearing' is necessarily implied the power to administer some adequate remedy." That remedy, they say, must be a determination of special benefits actually received, for otherwise the legislators are accused of insincerity, dissimulation, and mockery. The argument seems to me a plain begging of the question. The question is, Did the legislature intend to provide the "hearing" required by the "old" Constitution, then in force, or the "hearing" required by the "new" Constitution of 1898? The argument seems to assume that in 1889 no "hearing" was a "hearing" unless it was for the purpose of determining benefits actually received as a matter of fact. Although I agree in the statement that well-disposed taxing officers would remedy their omissions and mistakes, if they noticed or were informed of them, without any "hearing," yet I say that the legislature never had the power to frame a law that shut off the property owner on the presumption that the assessing officers would make no omissions or mistakes. In all valid taxation, three things have ever been required: First. A law directing the assessing officers how to proceed. The authority to tax is exclusively a legislative power. "This is manifest from the slightest consideration of what taxation is. It is the making of rules and regulations under which the necessary revenues for all the needs of government are to be apportioned between the people and collected from them." Cooley, Tax'n, 2d ed. 41. Second. An assessment by the proper administrative officials, which must be made in substantial conformity to the method prescribed by the law; for the expression of one method is the exclusion of all others. Third. An opportunity for the property owner to have a "hearing" before some tribunal with judicial powers on the question whether or not the assessing officers have substantially complied with the method prescribed by the law. So the word "hearing" does not necessarily imply a hearing on special benefits as a matter of fact; for, on the question of the correctness of special assessments for special benefits declared as a matter of law, the property owner was entitled to a "hearing," and it would have been oppression and confiscation to have denied it to him. The city is the actor in prosecuting the proceedings that result in a judgment making the assessments conclusive upon the lands of abutting proprietors. The engineer files his report, assessing each piece of contributing property a certain sum as he has computed it according to the commands of § 6. The hearing provided for in § 7 is, according to the language of the act, a hearing upon the report of the engineer and the assessments therein. It is axiomatic that in all hearings the tribunal must determine the case upon the charge filed against the defendant. This is true, not only in all cases before regularly ordained courts, but also in all special proceedings before special tribunals. In proceedings before city commissioners for the opening and vacation of streets (Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 3166 et seq.; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, §§ 3166 et seq.; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 3629 et seq.), before circuit courts and before boards of county commissioners for the establishment of public drains (Rev. Stat. 1881, chap. 49; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, chap. 49; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, chap. 49), before boards of county commissioners in the various proceedings relating to free gravel roads (Rev. Stat. 1881, chap. 70; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, chap. 70; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, chap. 76), the landowners are afforded a hearing on the question of special benefits, not because they are offered a hearing, but because the charge upon which the hearing is had is that their particular lands are severally specially benefited. In all these cases, the question for the tribunal to determine on the hearing is whether the engineer (or viewers, or corresponding officials, who formulate the charge against the property owners) has fully, impartially, and correctly performed the duties laid upon him by the statute. If he has, judgment confirming his action is rendered; if he has not, the tribunal alters or amends, or requires him to alter or amend, his charge to conform to what it should have been in the first place if he had complied with his duties under the statute, and then renders judgment on the charge. This principle has been fully recognized in the street improvement cases of Garvin v. Daussman, 114 Ind. 429, 16 N. E. 826, and Terre Haute v. Mack, 139 Ind. 99, 38 N. E. 468. In Hutcheson v. Storrie (June 19, 1899) 92 Tex. 685, 45 L. R. A. 289, 51 S. W. 852, the supreme court of Texas had before it a law that is exactly the same in esentials as the Barrett law. After the engineer files his report of the total cost, etc., and of the assessment upon each lot by frontage, the city council gives notice by publication of a hearing, when the property owners may "object to any such acts and proceedings, and show wherein they have been or may be wronged or injured thereby, and ask for a revision or correction of the same." The city council cannot make the final assessments until all objections have been heard and determined. It will be observed that the Texan property owners were given an opportunity to "show wherein they have been or may be wronged or injured" by the front-foot assessment. This is certainly as broad as the right to "make objection" to the report and the assessments therein. And the court said: "The foregoing provision of the charter authorizes the property owner to call upon the city council to revise and correct errors committed in the proceeding had in assessing the cost of improvement against his property, but it does not empower the council to do anything that it or its officers could not have done in the first instance. The words 'revision' and 'correction' mean that the council may be called upon to review that which had been done, and to make the proceedings conform to the law. Vinsant v. Knox, 27 Ark. 272. The city council, and the officers acting under the authority of the charter of the city of Houston, having no power, in the first instance, to consider the question of benefits in fixing the amount to be charged against Mrs. Hutcheson's property, a revision and correction of the acts done could not give relief against the wrong complained of. . . . The claim that, upon petition of Mrs. Hutcheson, the council could have afforded relief from the unlawful exaction, is wholly unsupported by the terms of the law, and is in direct conflict with many of its provisions. The wrong did not consist in a failure to follow the directions of the law, but in obeying its unconstitutional requirements." So, on the hearing mentioned in § 7 of the Barrett law, the inquiry must be confined to the question whether or not the assessment reported by the engineer has been made as it ought to have been made in the first instance,—that is, in conformity to the terms of the law prescribing his duties,—unless that hearing, of all the hearings in the world, is to be made an exception to the universal rule that a tribunal must determine a case on the charge filed against the defendant, and is not at liberty to discard that charge, and reach out and draw in some other from undefined sources and by undefined methods. On the "hearing" the common council "may adopt, alter, or amend such report, and the assessments therein." It is true that "alter" means "to make otherwise." But it does not follow that the report and the assessments therein cannot be made otherwise than the engineer made them, except by abandoning the method of testing the assessments by the standard of special benefits declared as a matter of law, and following the method of testing the assessments by the standard of special benefits actually received determined as a matter of fact. If the engineer made any mistakes in following out the front-foot method prescribed for him, his report, and the assessments therein, would be made otherwise by correcting the errors. But "alter" is used in connection with other words. The council "may amend" the report and the assessments therein. "Amendment" is usually understood in law to mean the supplying of deficiencies. If the engineer made any omissions of property or other material matter, his report, and the assessments therein, would be amended by supplying the deficiencies. The council "may adopt" the report and the assessments therein. If the engineer, as the assessing officer, has made no mistakes or omissions in laying the assessments in his report, surely the council, as a reviewing tribunal, should be permitted to confirm the assessments. In taking the actual language of the clause, something more than the word "alter" should be considered. For example, it makes a difference whether the auxiliary verb "may" or "shall" is connected with "alter." Standing alone, "alter" can be given the broadest definition to be found in the dictionaries; and, if the auxiliary verb and the object are to be assumed, and not taken from the actual language of the clause itself, it is possible, of course, to say that the common council "shall alter the basis of the assessments in the engineer's report." But the actual language is that the council may adopt, alter, or amend the engineer's report and the assessments therein. The method on which the engineer's report and the assessments therein are based has been continuously asserted throughout the preceding sections. The canons of interpretation require that general words be limited to the sense of the context. "Not only are words and provisions modified to harmonize with the leading and controlling purpose or intention of an act, but also by comparison of one subordinate part with another: that is to say, the sense of particular words or phrases may be greatly influenced by the context, or their association with other words and clauses." Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 262. "General words or clauses may be restricted to effectuate the intention, or to harmonize them with other expressed provisions. Where general language, construed in a broad sense, would lead to absurdity, it may be restrained. The particular inquiry is, not what is the abstract force of the words, or what they may comprehend, but in what sense they were intended to be used as they are found in the act." Id. § 246.

To insert into the 7th section the elements that the legislature failed to include is, I think, not only violative of the plain language of that section, but is destructive of other parts of the act. The primary rule of construction is to take the language of the legislature in question according to the plain and ordinary meaning of the words, without adding to or taking therefrom, and, if the language so taken does not create an ambiguity, to accept it as declaratory of the legislative intent. But, if there were an ambiguity, then the next rule of construction should require the court so to resolve the ambiguity as to give effect and purpose and meaning to the other parts of the act. If the ambiguity (supposed, for the sake of argument) were resolved in favor of the idea that the council, on the hearing, is required to determine the assessments on the basis of special benefits actually received, then the 6th section is deleted from the act, and the legislature is convicted of the folly of having provided elaborately and explicitly for a method of assessing upon each front foot throughout the improvement an equal sum (a method that necessarily excludes the consideration of special benefits actually received), and then declaring that on the hearing the council, not may, but shall, disregard and throw aside all that has been done relating to assessments, and begin de novo, and make the assessments by the method of determining the special benefits actually received. My brethren seek to save some purpose and meaning in § 6 by holding, as I understand them, that the engineer does not make the assessments, but simply reports certain facts for the enlightenment of the council when that body enters upon the making of the assessments according to special benefits actually received. If this were true, § 6 would nevertheless accuse the legislature of dealing in futilities. How would the council, when that body purposes to enter upon the making of the assessments according to special benefits actually received, be enlightened by being informed of the total cost of the improvement? The average cost per front foot? The name of each property owner? The number of front feet owned by each? The amount due upon each lot, ascertained and fixed by multiplying the cost per front foot by the number of front feet of each lot? The legal description of each lot? How would these items afford the council any information on those matters on account of which my brethren say that special benefits actually received should be considered, namely, that it is "clear that all property bordering upon a municipal highway is not affected in the same way by an improvement of the latter; that in some cases the grade may be so raised or lowered as to impair most seriously the use and value of the property; in others, that some property may be situate upon a general level, highly improved, and in a business part of the city, while others upon the same street may be remote from business, lying low, and near a watercourse, and practically worthless for business or residential purposes; in others, some abutting lots may be 20 feet and others 200 feet deep?" But it is not true that the engineer simply reports certain facts and makes no assessments. He is required to ascertain and fix the amount due upon each lot by multiplying the average cost per front foot by the number of front feet of each lot. This is an assessment, as will hereinafter more fully be shown. It is sufficient for the present to point out that the legislature has in express words defined the engineer's ascertainment and fixing of the amounts due upon the several lots as "assessments." The legislature says that the matter in review before the council as a tribunal is the engineer's report and the assessments therein. And the matters other than the assessments, in the engineer's report, are material only on the theory that the property owners are afforded a "hearing" to challenge the correctness of the assessments, as "hearing" was defined in Garvin v. Daussman, 114 Ind. 429, 16 N. E. 826. It is true that, if a property owner's assessment were made on the basis of special benefits actually received, it could be figured out that the assessment amounted to so much per front foot,—$4.98 in one case and $1.30 in another. But it would have been just as reasonable for the legislature to require the engineer to report the number of persons in each property owner's family; for, in the same way, it could be figured out that the assessment amounted to so much per head.

To insert into the 7th section the elements that the legislature failed to include would also destroy the 5th section of the act. That section empowers the council to pay the contractor from time to time during the progress of the work. Such payments are made out of the treasury, and are declared to be liens upon the abutting property. The city incurs no personal liability to the contractor, but acts merely as an instrumentality in collecting money for the contractor from the property owners. Quill v. Indianapolis, 124 Ind. 292, 7 L. R. A. 681, 23 N. E. 788; Spidell v. Johnson, 128 Ind. 235, 25 N. E. 889. The plain meaning of the section is that, if the city shall advance money from the treasury to the contractor, the city shall have the absolute right to reimbursement from the property owners by means of the liens that, by this 5th section, are put upon the abutting property. If the city, under § 5, should advance to the contractor 90 per centum, say, of the cost, and if, under § 7, as my brethren construe it, the city must limit the assessment against each parcel to an amount not exceeding the special benefits actually received by it, 50 per centum, say, of the cost, then the plain meaning of § 5 is utterly destroyed, and the city would be left with a loss of 40 per centum, say, of the cost, although the city had begun and carried forward the improvement under a resolution declaring that all of the cost, except for street and alley crossings, should be borne by the abutting property. If city officials had understood this necessary result of the construction contended for in this and other cases pending in this court, they might not have been so ready to deprive themselves of so much cash or debt-incurring margin to use for other purposes.

To insert into the 7th section the elements the legislature failed to include would also destroy the 3d section of the act. This section provides the fund for paying the contractor. As soon as the work is determined upon, the council makes a contract with the best bidder. The contractor gives a bond for the prompt and faithful performance of the work. The contract is, of course, binding upon him, and he must execute it, or be liable on his bond. He enters into this binding contract on the faith of a positive legislative declaration: "The city or incorporated town shall be liable to the contractor for the contract price of said improvement, and the owners of lots or parts of lots bordering on such street or alley or the part thereof to be improved shall be liable to the city for their proportion of the costs in the ratio of the front line of their lots owned by them to the whole improved line for street or alley improvements, and the city or incorporated town shall have a lien upon such lots or parts of lots, respectively, from the time such improvement is ordered, for such cost of improvement, . . . [which] shall be assessed upon the ground fronting or immediately abutting on such improvement back to the distance of 150 feet from such front line, and the city or incorporated town and the contractor shall have a lien thereon for the value of such improvement." As already stated, the city is not personally liable to the contractor. If the city has advanced money, it has the lien by which to secure reimbursement. If the contractor receives his contract price in improvement certificates or bonds, he has the lien by which to collect the contract price of his labor and materials. This section also says that the city "shall be liable and pay for all that part of such street or alley improvement as shall be occupied by the street and alley crossings." The plain meaning of § 3 is that, unless the city voluntarily assumes in advance to pay some definite percentage of the total cost, the city shall pay for street and alley crossings, and the property owners shall pay for the rest of the improvement; and that, if the city assumes a certain percentage, the residue of the total cost, except for street and alley crossings, which must be paid for by the city, is to be borne by the property owners. By the implied power that my brethren find in § 7, this meaning is destroyed. If the assessments are to be measured by the actual benefits which the property owners receive from the improvement, it is evident that the improvement as a whole must be considered. The question would be, How much special benefit does each lot actually receive from this improvement? And each owner's contribution towards the cost as a whole would be determined accordingly. And the excess of cost, as one sum, would have to be paid by the city. It seems indisputable that the total cost would thus be divided between the city and the property owners on a contingency that bears no relation to the number of feet in the street and alley crossings. Yet § 3 clearly separates the improvement itself and the liability therefor into two distinct parts.

Further, in regard to § 3, my brethren say that it should be noted that the provision is "that the cost shall be estimated by the running foot, not assessed." They quote the definition that an assessment is the "adjusting of the shares of a contribution towards a common beneficial object according to the benefit received." Here, again, my brethren seem to revert to the idea that the plan required by the "new" Constitution is the only one in which special benefits are the sole basis for special assessments. But, as already shown, special benefits were the common starting point of the two divergent lines of thought. So, if the definition selected by my brethren were the one the legislators had in mind, it would not disclose which method they intended to pursue. But it seems clear to me, from an examination of the whole act, that the definition the legislators intended to express was that an assessment is "an official estimate of the sums which are to constitute the basis of an apportionment of a tax between the individual subjects of taxation within a district." Anderson, Law Dict. In § 3, the part of the sentence that commands how the estimate shall be made, and what the liability of the lotowners shall be, ends with a semicolon, and the sentence proceeds: "and in making the assessment against such owners for the improvement of such lots or parts of lots and unplatted lands [the cost] shall be assessed upon the ground fronting or immediately abutting on such improvement back to the distance of 150 feet from such front line, and the city or incorporated town and the contractor shall have a lien thereon for the value of such improvement." Again, in § 3: "Such assessments, with the interest accruing thereon, shall be a lien upon the property so assessed, and shall remain a lien until fully paid." And in § 10: "In case any of the owners of lots or parcels of ground on which such assessments have been made shall fail or refuse for the space of twenty days after the date of the estimate to pay the amount thereof due by such person to such contractor, such contractor shall file his affidavit in the clerk's office of said city, stating that the whole or some part of said assessment remains unpaid." etc. And again, in § 10: "And in case the court and jury shall find, upon trial, the proceedings of said officers subsequent to said order directing the work to be done are regular, that a contract has been made, that the work has been done, in whole or in part, according to the contract, and that the estimate has been properly made thereon, then said court shall direct said property to be sold," etc. It therefore seems clear that the legislature understood an "official estimate" to be an "assessment." And the legislature did not confine itself to the use of the word "estimate;" for, in the part of § 3 that my brethren have omitted, it appears in plain words that the lots shall be "so assessed."

Again, it is said that § 3 contains no mandate that the property "shall ultimately be required to contribute equally per front foot." I do not see how language could be made clearer: "The owners of lots . . . shall be liable . . . in the ratio of the front line of their lots owned by them to the whole improved line." This liability is secured by a lien. It is the fund on which the contractor relies for payment. And it is the only fund, if the city is up to its debt limit, or becomes so after the contract is made, and before the work is completed. My brethren say that § 3 requires "that the liability shall relate to the frontage." But I take it that they do not mean to concede that the liability shall be according to the frontage. They only mean that the liability for special benefits in fact received, after it is determined at the conclusion of the work, is susceptible of being figured into a relation with the frontage,—a phase of the subject that has already been noticed sufficiently. But it is said that "the measure of liability and lien here mentioned are only conjectured, at most, since they arise before an ascertainment of the facts, by measurement, necessary to their definite determination." The order for the improvement, which enters into the contract, and the contract itself, disclose the dimensions, location, and character of the work, and the price per front foot, in terms, or in terms reducible to the front foot. So far as the contractor is concerned, the moment the contract is let he can determine the amount of liability of each property owner and of the city for street and alley crossings as well as when the work is finished. It is true that in the assessment made by the engineer, at the conclusion of the work, the "total cost" may include other items, such as advertising, etc.; but in these matters the contractor is not interested, for the contract is the limit of his claim and lien. Huntington v. Force, 152 Ind. 368, 53 N. E. 443. But, if there were any uncertainty in the amount finally to be allowed the contractor, no uncertainty would thereby be introduced into the liability; for the lien by the front foot could be fixed in advance for whatever amount the contractor's due proved to be.

In endeavoring to leave some purpose in § 3 my brethren, if I comprehend their meaning, hold that the section does not fix any basis for assessments, but only provides for a prima facie calculation of liability. This seems to me a purpose that is contrary to the entire scope and manifest intent of the act. But I admit that it would be some purpose, if all the lotowners, except the "aggrieved" mentioned in § 7, might, by not objecting and not asking to be heard, accept the prima facie calculation as a correct statement of their liability. Such a construction, however, would at once run counter to the objection that the statute did not provide for a "uniform and equal" rate of assessment. Suppose that the prima facie calculation was $1,000 against each, A and B, who own equal frontage; that A is "aggrieved," and B is not; that A proves to the satisfaction of the council that his special benefits actually received are $500; that A offers to prove that B's special benefits actually received are $1,500; that the council agrees with A as to the truth of the matter, but holds that, since B has made no objections, nor appeared to be heard, B has the right to accept the prima facie amount as the true amount. Then B receives $500 in actual benefits that he does not pay for, and A is compelled to pay (1) his special benefits actually received, (2) his proportion of the city's contribution on account of general benefits, and (3) his proportion of the special benefits accruing to B and all others similarly situated. Now, to avoid this difficulty, it is further held that all persons whose lands are included in the engineer's report are bound to take notice that the council will so increase or decrease the prima facie calculations as to make them equal the special benefits actually received. And in holding that the prima facie calculations are not even prima facie the true amounts, but that the amounts must be adjusted on the radically different basis of actual benefits, my brethren come around to the original position of discarding all the steps provided for in the sections preceding the seventh, and of requiring the council to determine the assessments de novo on the basis of actual benefits; thus depriving § 3 of any intelligent purpose. It seems to me incredible that the legislature intended that its positive and explicit mandates expressed in the prior sections should be overborne by an implication read into § 7. And I think it equally faulty to suppose that the legislature intended that the contractor should bind himself, under penalty, to perform work, for the payment of which § 3 gives him a lien upon the abutting property by the front foot, and then that the common council, at the procurement of the property owners, should abrogate the contract, should destroy the improvement certificates or bonds, should approve and accept the work, and deprive the contractor of his pay. To quote from Hutcheson v. Storrie, 92 Tex. 685, 45 L. R. A. 289, 51 S. W. 848: "In support of this conclusion, we call attention to the potent fact that the city had entered into a contract with Storrie for the performance of the work at a stipulated price, and with the agreement that he should be paid in improvement certificates, which would hold a lien upon the property, before the amount of the assessment was ascertained. If the engineer, for instance, committed an error in estimating the cost of the work in front of Mrs. Hutcheson's property, then a revision and correction of that act by the council could be had, and the wrong could be corrected, because the contract itself furnishes the data, and the correction would accord with the contract. If, however, the council had changed the basis of the assessment against Mrs. Hutcheson's property from the costs of the work to that of benefits received by the property, whereby the amount assessed would be lessened, the contract would have been annulled. A construction should not be placed upon the language that would empower the city to destroy the contract without the consent of Storrie." If the pavement contractors had understood this necessary result of the construction contended for in this and other cases pending in this court, they might not have been so ready to take contracts under an act which deprives them of the absolute right to definite liens on the lots of the property owners, and remits them to the uncertainty of collection from the municipalities. In Cason v. Lebanon (Ind.) 55 N. E. 768, it was held that a contractor, in contracting to do street-improvement work under the Barrett law, must take notice of the city's indebtedness; that, if the contractor could not collect from the city for its part of the liability, the whole contract was not destroyed; that the consideration to be paid by the abutting property owners was sufficient to support the contract; and that the property owners had no ground of complaint unless the contractors put in higher bids than they would have if the city's part of the expense was collectable. This strikes me as justifiable doctrine, if the improvement itself and the liability therefor are considered as divided into two distinct parts, which may be known to and examined by both the contractor and the property owners when the contract is let, and before the work is begun. But, under the construction of the Barrett law that is now adopted, the contract, at the time it is made, is severable neither as to the work nor as to the liability therefor. After the work as an entirety is done, a severance of the total liability is made; but until then no one could tell what was the extent of the city's liability, or what the property owners'. If, at the time the contract is entered into, the city be indebted to the limit, it is likely that the contractor's bid would be higher, on account of the uncertainty of getting his pay. Yet, no matter how high his bid, the chance of even getting his money back would depend upon a contingency, after his labor and materials were expended, entirely within the power and discretion of the adverse parties to the contract. And if, at the time the contract is entered into, the city have a debt-incurring margin to the amount of the contract, the council, without the consent of the contractor, could exhaust that margin in waterworks, electric lights, etc., and then find that the actual special benefits to the property owners were not half the amount of the contractor's expenditures. Street improvements are public improvements. Special benefits are benefits that are not common to the citizens in general. How much the contractor may collect as special benefits, and how much as general benefits, is left for his adversary in the contract to say.

By my brethren's reading of § 7 (that is, that the council, on the hearing upon the engineer's report and the assessments therein, shall disregard the method of assessment pursued down to that point, and upon which the contract is based, and shall substitute a de novo inquiry into the special benefits actually received), the legislature is accused and found guilty of ignorance of the meaning or even the existence of the word "benefits." Yet on the statute book, as already pointed out, there were many instances in which assessments for improvements were carefully provided for on the basis or by the method of ascertaining the special benefits, as a matter of fact, and limiting the assessments to that amount, and apportioning the cost in ratio to such benefits; and in this very statute (the Barrett law) assessments for the construction of sewers are directed to be limited and apportioned according to benefits. Hereinabove only the material parts of 49 L. R. A.

the act relating to street improvements have been referred to. In reference to the assessment lien given in § 3, the language concerning sewer construction is that "the cost of any such sewer shall be apportioned among the lands, lots, and parts of lots, benefited thereby, and according to such benefits, . . . and the owners . . . of the lots or parts of lots benefited by the construction of such sewer shall be liable, for the construction of such sewer, for the benefit of such lots or parts of lots thereby." In reference to the duties of the engineer in making his report to the council, the first six items from the 6th section relate to street improvements. The seventh item in that section relates to sewer construction: "Seventh. In the case of the construction of a sewer, a description of each lot or parcel of lot benefited thereby, together with the owner's name, and the fair proportion of the cost of such sewer, according to the benefits conferred thereby, that should be assessed against such lot or part of a lot." If a sewer is constructed, and a landowner objects to his assessment, the hearing on the engineer's report, provided for in § 7, gives him his "day in court" on the question of benefits, because the charge on which the hearing is had is that his lands should be assessed a certain sum, according to the benefits conferred. Sutherland says that attention should be given, not only to the language used, but also to "the words or expressions which obviously are by design omitted." Section 239. See also § 241. It seems strange to suppose that the legislature did not know the vital difference between the engineer's assessment in street-improvement cases and in sewer cases; between the Men declared in § 3 for street improvements and the lien declared in the same section for sewer construction; between a method of legislatively assuming and fixing the special benefits at the cost per front foot, as a matter of statute law, and a method of providing for a determination of the actual benefits, as a matter of fact. And the legislature's nicety in making these distinctions cannot be overborne, excepting by reading into § 7 an implication that renders meaningless many parts of the act, and ignores others. All of the matter in the Barrett law in reference to sewer construction was a new feature in street improvement statutes in this state. I believe my brethren state the rule of construction correctly: "The intention is to be ascertained by considering the entire statute; and we must proceed as we would with any other composition, construing it with reference to the leading idea and purpose of the whole instrument. The general intent is the polar star by which the meaning of any part is to be determined with a view to harmonizing the entire act." But I do not understand the purpose in stating the rule, if it is not to be followed. I find that material parts of §§ 3, 5, 6, 8, 9, and 10, and the whole of the interrelated sewer law, are omitted from consideration.

It is axiomatic that the constitutional provision authorizing the levy and collection of taxes is not self-executing. It is fundamental that the provision cannot be made operative by the executive department, nor by the judicial department, but only by the legislative department. It is elementary that the power must be carried into execution by appropriate legislation, and that no taxing bodies or officers can make a valid assessment unless they follow with substantial strictness the precise method prescribed by the statute. If the constitutional provision be read into the statute, it is not perceived how the situation is changed. If the provision is not self-executing as it stands in the Constitution, it is not self-executing when read into the statute. If it cannot rightfully be put into operation by the judicial department as it stands in the Constitution, it cannot rightfully be put into operation by the judicial department when read into the statute. If it can only be carried into execution by appropriate legislation as it stands in the Constitution, it can only be carried into execution by appropriate legislation when read into the statute. The appropriate legislation necessary to put into execution the constitutional provision for taxation, by the method of limiting assessments to actual benefits in street-improvement cases, cannot be supplied by the judicial department, it seems to me, without going outside its proper limits. The constitutional provision that "no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation" is likewise not self-executing. It is a negative provision,—an inhibition. If the constitutional provision be read into the statute, what is accomplished? If it is only a negative provision, an inhibition, as it stands in the Constitution, it is only a negative provision, an inhibition, when read into the statute. If affirmative legislation is needed to enable a city to act under the provision as it stands in the Constitution, affirmative legislation is needed to enable a city to act under the provision when read into the statute. In the place of the established principles for ascertaining judicially the legislative intent, substitute the following formula: Take a statute in which the only method prescribed for fixing assessments is by frontage, regardless of actual benefits, read into this statute the constitutional inhibition of the laying of assessments by that method, delete from the statute all that conflicts with the inhibition, and amend the statute by adding thereto all the affirmative legislation that is needed to prescribe a method of apportioning and limiting assessments according to special benefits actually received. In other words, take a piece of paper, and erase what is on it, so that it becomes a blank. Then write upon it the necessary directions by which a constitutional provision that is not self-executing can be executed. "The certainty and stability of the law are among its chief excellencies. By following this legal injunction, the common law has become a symmetrical system. The same authoritative rule applied to statutory construction gives a wholesome precision to dubious generalities, and 49 L. R. A.

otherwise removes doubts which arise upon obscure provisions, and has a salutary tendency to give confidence to those who must act upon statutes, but cannot settle their meaning." Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 313. "The aid of contemporaneous construction is invoked where the language of a statute is of doubtful import, and cannot be made plain by the help of any other part of the same statute, nor by the assistance of any act in pari materia which may be read with it, nor of the course of the common law up to the time of its enactment. Under such circumstances the court may consider what was the construction put upon the act when it first came into operation. Where this has been given by enactment, it is conclusive. A contemporaneous construction is that which it receives soon after its enactment. This, after the lapse of time, without change of that construction by legislation or judicial decision, has been declared to be generally the best construction. It gives the sense of the community as to the terms made use of by the legislature. If there is ambiguity in the language, the understanding of the application of it when the statute first goes into operation, sanctioned by long acquiescence on the part of the legislature and judicial tribunals, is the strongest evidence that it has been rightly explained in practice. A construction under such circumstances becomes established law." Id. § 307. "The uniform legislative interpretation of doubtful constitutional provisions, running through many years, and a similar construction of statutes, has great weight. The contemporary and subsequent action of the legislature in reference to the subject-matter has been accepted as controlling evidence of the intention of a particular act." Id. § 311. "It is to be observed that in the comparison of different statutes passed at the same session, or nearly at the same time, this circumstance has weight; for it is usually referred to as indicating the prevalence of the same legislative purpose, as rendering it unlikely that any marked contrariety was intended." Id. § 283. "The practical construction given to a doubtful statute by the public officers of the state, and acted upon by the people thereof, is to be considered; it is, perhaps, decisive in case of doubt." Id. § 309.

In the light of these canons of construction, it is important to examine the interpretation given to the Barrett law by the legislative, administrative, and judicial departments of the state during the ten years that elapsed from 1880 to the adoption of the new Constitution. But my brethren pass by all of these considerations. In speaking of the judicial history of the state prior to 1889, they say: "That this court prior to 1889 supported the doctrine that the legislature had constitutional sanction to declare, as matter of law, that the special benefits to a particular district by an improvement were equally received by bordering property, and equal to the total cost, had little force as an argument. The answer to it is that the injustice and hardship resulting from the doctrine was potential in securing legislative action for the amelioration of the rule." The inquiry being the intent of the legislature, the so-called answer is a begging of the question. The judicial history prior to 1889 is useful in showing a long-continued judicial approval of a long-continued legislative policy, and in affording the basis for the presumption that no marked contrariety was intended in the Barrett law. But the judicial history since 1889 is more important because the Barrett law itself is involved. This judicial history is found to be a continued approval of a continuation of the long-settled legislative policy. Of this, my brethren say: "There is language used in Terre Haute v. Mack, 139 Ind. 99, 38 N. E. 468, and perhaps in other cases in this and the appellate court, not necessary to the decision of any question presented by the record, that appears in conflict with what is here decided; but, in so far as such language may so appear, it is disapproved." In the first place, I think that an examination of the cases will show that the language disapproved was necessary to the decision of the questions presented by the records. But, whether the language is disapproved because it is supposed to be dictum, or because it is thought the cases were wrongly decided, the disapproval cannot take those cases out of the judicial history of the state. As contemporaneous expositions of the legislative intent, acquiesced in by the legislature, their force is not dependent upon the correctness of the decisions from the court's present point of view. In Quill v. Indianapolis (May term, 1890) 124 Ind. 292, 7 L. R. A. 681, 23 N. E. 788, this statement was made: "Assessments for street improvements are upheld on the ground that the adjacent property upon which the cost of the improvement is assessed is enhanced in value to an equal amount to the sum assessed against it, and that the owners have received peculiar benefits, which the citizens do not share in common." In Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Edgerton (May term, 1890) 125 Ind. 455, 25 N. E. 436, after quoting the extract hereinbefore given from Garvin v. Daussman, the court said: "We have no reason to doubt the soundness of the doctrine enunciated in this case, and under this rule §§ 6 and 7 of this act [the Barrett law] afford the owners of property abutting upon a street to be improved a remedy which the legislature, in its wisdom, deemed sufficient for their protection." In Terre Haute v. Mack (May term, 1894) 139 Ind. 99, 38 N. E. 468, a street improvement was made under the provisions of the Barrett law. The assessments were levied against the abutting property by the front-foot rule, except on a lot situated at the corner of another street. In the case of this lot, the amount to be assessed against it as a whole was determined by the frontage rule, the same as in the case of other lots abutting on the improved street. By the Barrett law the first 50 feet back from the front line is primarily liable for the assessment, and the remainder back to 150 feet is only secondarily liable. The first 50 feet of this lot was owned in three separate parcels. Mrs. Hudson owned the entire frontage. Her parcel extended back 19 feet. Froeb and Morgan owned the next parcel, extending across the lot, having a width of 18.6 feet, and fronting on the side street. Mrs. Mack owned the third parcel within the 50 feet, extending across the lot, having a width of 12.4 feet, and fronting on the side street. The engineer, in making his report, apportioned the assessment upon this lot among the three parcels in the ratio of actual benefits. The council, on the "hearing on such report and the assessments therein," approved and confirmed the apportionment by that method. On these facts, the assessment against Mrs. Mack's property was declared to be void, and the following principles were established: That the engineer's report is the only legal basis on which any assessment can be made against any land whatever; that no assessment can be made, except on an abutting lot; that such assessment can only be by the front foot; that the engineer cannot lay, nor can the common council adjudge, an assessment on any other rule than frontage, because no other basis or method is prescribed; that the revision goes only to the correction of errors, as indicated in Garvin v. Daussman. Among other things, the court said: "We have nothing to do with the policy, expediency, or justice of the statute. . . . It is a well-recognized rule in the interpretation of statutes that the whole act and all its parts must be construed together, so as to give effect to all the language employed, and inconsistent expressions are to be harmonized to reach the real intent of the legislature. The statute ought to be so construed as to make it a consistent whole. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 239-246. It appears from the complaint and answer that the engineer reported an estimate in favor of the contractors against the property owners benefited thereby, to wit: Mary V. Hudson, on a strip or lot of ground on said Fifth street, 137.96 feet along said street and 19 feet wide, $297.06; Froeb & Morgan, a strip or lot 137.96 feet long, parallel with said street, 18.6 feet wide, adjoining the strip first described, $27.10; and Amanda D. Mack, a strip or lot 137.93 feet long, parallel with said street, adjoining the last-described strip, and 12.4 feet wide,—said strips or lots being lots 1 and 2, and a part of lot 3 of said Blake's subdivision. Such an estimate as this, the engineer had no right to make. He was required by the statute, as we have seen, to report the amount of such cost for improvement upon the ground bordering on the improved street, which amount he was required to ascertain and fix by multiplying the average cost price by the number of front feet; also, the name of the owner of the lot so bordering on said street. The name of the owner of such lot was Mary V. Hudson, and, her lot being the only one that bordered on the improved street, the amount due upon it he was required to ascertain and fix by multiplying the average cost price per running foot by the number of running front feet of her lot. And this he was required to report to the common council, and such report the amended 7th section required the common council to approve and confirm, or, in case it was incorrect, to cause it to be amended, and to make the assessment according to such report. Therefore, if the statute had been followed by the city engineer and common council, the whole amount of cost of the improvement for which the whole 150 feet back from the line of Mrs. Hudson's lot bordering on the improved street could in any event be made liable would have been assessed against Mrs. Hudson's lot No. 1. Without the proviso in § 3, no person whose lot or ground does not border and abut on the improved part of the street could be made liable for any part of the cost of the improvement in any event. Ray v. Jeffersonville, 90 Ind. 567. But the proviso makes such land liable only in the event that the lots or parcels preceding it towards the front or border have proven insufficient to pay the cost of the improvement. And the amount for which such ground is in any event made liable is not fixed by any assessment or ascertainment either by the engineer or common council, but it is fixed and ascertained by the balance remaining unpaid of the whole amount assessed on the front-foot lot or parcel after the exhaustion of the parcels that precede it to the front. That cannot be known and ascertained until such preceding parcels have been sold. Therefore the act of the engineer in fixing and apportioning any amount against the appellee's lot was without authority of law and void, and the act of the common council in assessing said amount against appellee's lot was void, and she was entitled to have it declared so." The engineer having made, and the council having confirmed, an assessment according to special benefits actually received, and their power to do so having been challenged, I cannot see why the language used, and a full consideration of the scope and intent of the Barrett law, were not necessary to a decision of the question presented by the record.

This case was considered from the point of view of Mrs. Mack. Look at it a moment from Mrs. Hudson's standpoint. She owned a parcel of land having 138 feet frontage and 19 feet depth. The assessment for 138 feet frontage was $730.21. If her parcel, after being improved, would not sell for enough to pay the assessment, and back-lying parcels had to be sold to make up the deficiency, —and such cases have occurred under the Barrett law,—where do the special benefits come in? Though the legislature should declare, as a matter of law, if it had the power, that the special benefits equaled the cost, it would be difficult for anyone to point out wherein any special benefits, as a matter of fact, were derived from the proceeding. In Keith v. Wilson (May term, 1896) 145 Ind. 149, 44 N. E. 13, it was stated: "The law assumes that the property will be benefited to an amount equal to the cost of the improvements thus made." In Cason v. Lebanon (Ind.) 55 N. E. 768, it was claimed that a railroad company was bound by a contract with the city to improve the street, and that therefore an ordinance requiring the property owners to pay for the whole improvement, except street and alley crossings, was invalid. This court declared that "said contract did not deprive the city of the power to improve said street in the manner alleged in the complaint, at the expense of the abutting property owners, as provided by law." Though the statute was not particularly discussed in that case, it is sufficiently clear that the court considered it settled that the law provided for the construction of street improvements, except street and alley crossings, "at the expense of the abutting property owners." In Sands v. Hatfield, 7 Ind. App. 357, 34 N. E. 654, it was decided that, if the engineer omitted from his report any abutting property, the common council, on this fact being shown by objectors at the "hearing," should correct the report, and alter the assessments to what they would have been if the engineer had performed his duties properly in the first instance. The appellate court, on October 24, 1899, in Indianapolis & V. R. Co. v. Capitol Paving & Constr. Co. 54 N. E. 1076, said: "Conceding that appellant's right of way is 'land,' within the meaning of the charter, the question remains whether the right of way lying wholly within Kentucky avenue is within the designation of land abutting or bordering on the same avenue. We think the statement of the question furnishes its own solution. The city can assess only such lands as its charter designates, and, as the charter has designated lots or lands abutting or bordering on the street, none other can be assessed. We are not authorized to give the words used in the statute other than their well-defined and commonly accepted meaning. Conceding, without deciding or assuming, that the company's right of way is benefited by the improvement, the question is still unsolved, because the basis of the assessment is not property that will be benefited, but property that abuts or borders on the street. In authorizing the construction of such improvements, the legislature has assumed that they will benefit that property which abuts or borders on the part of the street improved. The right to impose such a tax is based upon a presumed equivalent. It has not been assumed that any property other than that designated will be benefited. What property the local officers may believe will be benefited is not the question. If a property owner is an abutting owner, he must bear his share of the burden, because the legislature has so directed." So it appears that the judicial department of this state has always hitherto entertained the same belief in regard to the scope and intent of the Barrett law that it did in regard to the street-improvement laws prior to 1889. The legislature has never indicated any dissent from this judicial interpretation, but, on the contrary, has shown its understanding and approval thereof.

tional requirements concerning taxation and compensation as that department has always understood them. That understanding was, in the language of Dillon (quoted in the dissenting opinion in Norwood v. Baker), that "whether the expense of making such improvements shall be paid out of the general treasury, or be assessed upon the abutting property or other property specially benefited, and, if in the latter mode, whether the assessment shall be upon all property found to be benefited, or alone upon the abutters, according to frontage or according to the area of their lots, is, according to the present [then] weight of authority, considered to be a question of legislative expediency." The legislative department of this state has always understood that the only basis for special assessments was special benefits, but that it was a matter of legislative discretion to declare absolutely by law that the special benefits were always and invariably equal to the cost of the improvement; that if, in sewer and highway and drainage acts, the equality of cost and benefit were not absolutely declared by law, but were left open to the determination of the truth by the assessing officers, whose assessment of actual benefits was reviewable before some tribunal duly clothed with power and procedure to that end, it was a matter of legislative grace, and not a matter of constitutional compulsion; and that, if the legislature chose to exercise its discretion by declaring that the cost of street improvements should be assessed upon the abutting property by frontage, the citizen could no more complain than in any other case in which the legislature had determined a question of legislative expediency. The Barrett law was enacted in 1889, and it was amended in 1891. It applies to all towns and cities not specially classified. In 1891 the legislature passed an act concerning the government and powers of cities of 100,000 population (Indianapolis). Acts 1891, p. 137. On pages 175-181 are the provisions relating to street improvements. The method prescribed is to assess the cost upon the abutting property by frontage; and no provision is made in the act for a "hearing" before the council or board of public works, but the property owners have only the hearing described in Garvin v. Dausseman. And although at each subsequent session acts regarding street improvements have been passed, and the charter of Indianapolis has been amended, the legislature has seen no occasion for changing the foregoing method for paying for street improvements. In 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 56) the charter of Indianapolis was so amended that the cost of paving street and alley crossings, which had before been borne by the city, was assessed against the property owners, but the charter was left unchanged so far as a hearing is concerned. At the same session, on March 3, 1893 (Id. p. 65), an act was approved relating to the government and powers of cities of 50,000 population (Evansville). On pages 104-110 are the provisions relating to street improvements. These provisions are the same as those in the charter of Indianapolis. On the same day, March 3, 1893, (Id. p. 202), an act was approved relating to the government and powers of cities of 35,000 population (Ft. Wayne). On pages 243-249 are the provisions relating to street improvements. These provisions are substantially the same as those in the charter of Indianapolis and Evansville, except that the Barrett law is followed, in providing for a hearing upon the assessment before the board of public works. The case of Terre Haute v. Mack, 139 Ind. 99, 38 N. E. 468, was decided on October 16, 1894. At the next session of the legislature after this decision, on March 11, 1895 (Acts 1895, p. 239), an act was approved that amended the charter of cities of 35,000 inhabitants so that the total cost of the improvement should be assessed by the front-foot rule upon the abutting property back to a line equidistant from the edge of the improved street and the next street parallel to it, but that, if a lot belonged to different persons, the assessment thereon should be apportioned among the several parcels according to the benefits received from the improvement by reason of being upon, near, or having access to it. Though other acts relating to street improvements were passed at this and each subsequent session, the act last above referred to remains the only instance in which the legislature has undertaken to prescribe the method of having the assessing officers assess and a tribunal determine special benefits, as a matter of fact, in street improvement cases. And, though this act is a very limited and imperfect application of the principle, it clearly illustrates two things: First, that the legislature understood the difference between "frontage" and "actual benefits;" second, that the legislature acted, as it always has, upon the assumption, sustained by the then weight of authority, that it was purely a question of legislative expediency whether or not the legislature should declare, as a matter of law, that each front foot was specially benefited to the extent of its pro rata share of the total cost. On the same day, March 11, 1895, an act was approved that amended the charter of cities of 50,000 inhabitants. Acts 1895, p. 258. Regarding street improvements the charter was so amended as to require the board of public works, after making out the final assessment roll, to give notice of a day "on which said board will receive and hear remonstrances from persons with regard to their respective assessments. On the day named in such notice said board shall proceed to hear and determine such remonstrances, and may change, modify, or confirm the same. Said assessment roll shall contain the names of the property holders and a description of the property assessed for such improvement, and shall contain the pro rata assessment against each piece of property. After hearing such remonstrances said department shall deliver such assessment roll as modified or confirmed to the department of finance." That the legislature intended in this, as in every other instance in which it was thought worth while to provide a hearing before a special tribunal, that the hearing should be upon the question whether or not the assessing officers had faithfully performed their duties according to statute, and had correctly reported the assessments as determined by the method prescribed for them to act upon,—that the review should be for the purpose of determining the correctness of the view,—is explicitly shown in another provision of this same act. Regarding sidewalk improvements, the charter was also amended so as to provide for a hearing after the assessment list has been prepared. "Upon the completion of said sidewalk said department shall cause to be prepared an assessment list, and shall notify such owner in the same manner as in this section above provided. Said notice shall fix a time and place when the owner may remonstrate against such assessment. On said day such owner may appear and remonstrate, and the board shall take final action and shall assess such owner and such real estate for the cost of such improvement." On March 15, 1895, an act came into effect by which the charter of cities of 100,000 inhabitants was again amended. Acts 1895, p. 384. Some minor changes were made in respect to collection of instalments of assessments, etc., but the charter was not amended in the matters involved in the amendments of the charter of Ft. Wayne or of Evansville. At the next session, on February 23, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 56), an act was approved whereby the charter of Indianapolis was further amended in reference to street improvements. It is a matter of common knowledge that the practice was generally adopted by city treasurers of notifying property owners by mail of the amounts of their assessments after they came into the hands of the treasurers for collection, and to state in the notice that it was given voluntarily, and not as a duty required. This amendment made the giving of such notice by mail obligatory upon the treasurer of Indianapolis, and further required him to publish a notice to all persons who had failed to avail themselves of the privilege of paying in instalments that, unless payment was made within thirty days, proceedings for the collection of assessments would be instituted. On February 26, 1897, the charter of Indianapolis was further amended. Acts 1897, p. 79. Some details about the cost of street and alley intersections, the issue of bonds, and the collection of instalments were changed; but the proceedings for fixing the final assessments by the board of public works were left as they were prescribed in the original act of 1891. At the last session of the legislature, on March 3, 1899, an act was approved that related to the government and powers of cities of 23,000 population (Terre Haute). Acts 1899, p. 270. In its essential features, it is the same as the charters of Evansville and Ft. Wayne. On pages 314-322 are the provisions concerning street improvements. The assessments for that purpose are to be made by the front-foot rule. But the assessments for sewer construction, according to the directions of every one of these acts, are to be laid upon the lands found to be benefited, and are to be apportioned according to, and not exceeding, the special benefits actually received. On March 4, 1899, an act was approved that again amended the charter of Indianapolis in reference to street improvements. Acts 1899, p. 399. The amendment provides for an appraisal of the abutting property, exclusive of improvements, and forbids the ordering of any improvement which, when completed, is to cost more than 25 per cent of the aggregate appraised value. This still leaves any parcel of abutting property liable to an assessment by frontage that might exceed the value of that parcel. And the hearing before the council or board of public works as to the correctness of the assessments, on which the present construction of the Barrett law is built up, has remained unprovided for to the end. Is it conceivable that the legislature foresaw the new Constitution, and entertained the deliberate design of making some of these acts constitutional and others unconstitutional? Assuredly not. This whole series of acts, from the Barrett law of 1889 to the last amendment of the charter of Indianapolis, in 1899, evidences a continuous and consistent legislative policy. That policy was to put street improvements upon a different basis from sewers and ditches and roads, and other like special proceedings. These street improvement statutes are the ones my brethren should have examined if they were seeking acts in pari materia by which to determine the scope and intent of the Barrett law. The sewer and ditch and gravel-road laws are only in pari materia with the sewer law interwoven in the act of 1889, which my brethren pass by without notice. The legislature never doubted that it had the power to do as it did. It assumed that it was purely a question of legislative expediency to require the whole cost of street improvements to be assessed upon the property by the running foot. The administrative department of the state, as represented in the various towns and cities, has uniformly acted under the law on the same assumption. It is a matter of common knowledge that the people, the lawyers, the contractors, the municipal officers, the legislature, and the courts have all been in accord in the understanding that under the Barrett law the city paid for street and alley crossings, and the abutters paid the rest of the total cost of street improvements according to a uniform rate per front foot, until the exigency arose, after the Norwood-Baker decision was studied, of hunting for some other meaning. If the continuous and consistent interpretation of the Barrett law, during all the years since its passage, by all the departments of the state, were looked to, and if the canons of construction as laid down in the books were followed, that construction should be accepted as decisive.

Thus far I have been stating the reasons why I am unable to join my brethren in finding in § 7 the "implied power" that authorizes the council to change the basis of the assessments. But it seems to me there is a vital difference between a power and a duty,—between the right to do a thing and the obligation to do it. In this case, the record shows, it is admitted that the council has already decided that it will not accord the property owners a hearing on the question of the amount of special benefits actually conferred by the improvement. Where is the command in the statute that forbids the council from basing the assessments upon the report of the engineer after it has been amended, if necessary, to conform to what the statute commanded the engineer to do in the first instance? If the legislature delegated to the council a discretion in the matter, the property owners could not base a suit for mandatory injunction upon what they deemed a mistaken exercise of that discretion. The statute says that the council “may adopt, alter, or amend the engineer’s report and the assessments therein;” not, “shall change the basis of assessments.” The statute permits the council to pay all or any part of the total cost of the improvement out of the treasury. This is purely and simply a matter of option. If the council paid the total cost, there would be no assessments. If the council determined to pay a certain portion of the total cost, the residue of the total would have to be assessed against the abutting property in the method provided by the statute. In this case, the record shows, it is admitted that the council has already ordained that the total cost shall be borne by the abutters. Now, if the improvement is to cost $10,000, and it should be found on the supposed hearing that the aggregate of special benefits actually received by the several parcels of abutting property was only $8,000 (though the complaint avers and the demurrer admits that the abutting property is not specially benefited at all, as a matter of fact), what good would it do to have the total cost apportioned among the abutters in the ratio of the special benefits, as among themselves? Each abutter would find his property assessed with 125 per cent of his special benefits. So it becomes necessary to find, both in the law and in appellee’s ordinance under the law, not only the right, but the duty, to pay the $2,000 excess out of the general treasury, although it is agreed that the city ordered the improvement with the intention and in the belief that it had the power to ordain “that the cost and expense thereof, including advertising, labor, and material for the same, be assessed against the property on the line.” And in the opinion filed by my brethren, though I notice that considerable attention is given to making out the “implied power,” I fail to find anything but a fiat that transforms the “implied power” into an “imperative duty.” The views I entertain are supported by authority. In Hutchison v. Storrie, 92 Tex. 685, 45 L. R. A. 289, 51 S. W. 848, and in Lyon v. Tona-wanda, 98 Fed. Rep. 361, statutes were involved that are essentially the same as the Barrett law; and in Charles v. Marion, 100 Fed. Rep. 538, the Barrett law was considered. I may also cite the last page of my brethren’s opinion, wherein the rules regarding “implied powers” are properly indicated.

Not only am I constrained to believe that the Barrett law as enacted is unconstitutional, but I am also of the opinion that the Barrett law as now construed by my brethren is unconstitutional. And I will suggest some of the reasons for thinking so: The taxing power is committed to the legislative department, and cannot be conferred upon the judicial. All assessments must be made by administrative officers, whose sole authority is to follow with substantial strictness the method pointed out by law. The property owner is entitled to a “day in court” to challenge the assessment. The court cannot make the assessment, but can only hear the challenge of the assessment already made, and then enter judgment confirming or correcting the assessment. If the engineer does not make the assessment as an administrative officer, and if the council does not merely review the assessment as a court, but if, on the contrary, no assessment is made until the council makes it on the hearing, the result is either that the assessment is made by a judicial tribunal, or that the hearing is for the purpose of enabling an administrative body to determine what assessment to make, with no opportunity for the property owner thereafter to challenge its correctness. A common council may at one time exercise legislative, at another administrative, and at another judicial, functions, but it cannot have two or three characters at the same time. If the prescribed mode of fixing assessments by frontage is deleted from the statute as enacted, there is not a word left limiting the council to any method or prescribing any rule of procedure whatever. There would likely be as many methods as there are towns and cities in the state. Uncertainty would probably prevail until, in suits involving the Barrett law as now construed, this court formulated a definite and uniform procedure. I cannot concur in the statement that “the absence of an express rule for guidance in the exercise of the power does not impair it. It is sufficient if the power to change the assessment from the frontage rule exists.” Regulations and methods in all tax matters must be prescribed by law. State Bd. of Tax Comrs. v. Holliday, 150 Ind. 216, 42 L. R. A. 826, 49 N. E. 14. In the syllabus of Barnes v. Dyer, 50 Vt. 469, it is said: “A statute empowering the authorities of a city to construct sidewalks, and make local assessments on the property fronting the same ‘for so much of the expense thereof as they shall deem just and equitable,’ is unconstitutional, in that there is no fixed, certain, and legal standard for assessment.” In State, New Brunswick Rubber Co., Prosecutors, v. New Brunswick Street and Sewer Comrs. 38 N. J. L. 190, 20 Am. Rep. 380, the following appears: “It is not sufficient that the legislative act merely declares that the cost, or a part of the cost, of the improvement shall be assessed upon the lots drained by the sewers to be built. It must, as well establish some rule,—some definite scheme,—within constitutional limits, for the apportionment of the tax upon the lands on which such special burthen is imposed. An act of the legislature directing a tax for a local improvement to be imposed upon particular lands, to be legal or effectual, must consist of something more than a mere authorization to assess a sum of money, the cost of a local improvement upon the designated property. The act must determine the mode of distributing the burthen, the property out of which the tax is to be made must be designated, and some certain standard of assessments established. It cannot properly be left by the legislature to the discretion of others to fix the method,"—courts, for example. A property owner is entitled to a law that operates according to constitutional principles without his intervention. According to the Barrett law as now construed, a property owner does not have a tax that is assessed on the basis of his actual special benefits, without affirmative action on his part at the hearing to see that it is put on that basis. Further, a lawful assessment must show on its face the principle according to which it is laid. State, New Brunswick Rubber Co. v. New Brunswick Streets and Sewers Comrs. supra. This would appear under the Barrett law as enacted, but not as construed. It seems to me that the property owner is subjected to a tax "without due process of law." The abutters alone are named in the engineer's report. My brethren hold that all such persons are bound by the published notice to know that assessments will be made at the hearing which shall correspond with special benefits actually received. They do not hold, as I understand them, that persons who are not abutters must take notice that their back-lying property will be assessed for actual benefits. The Barrett law as enacted made such persons secondarily liable. This was so, as was pointed out in Terre Haute v. Muak, 139 Ind. 99, 38 N. E. 468, not because they were included in the assessment either as made by the engineer or as confirmed by the council, for they were not, but because the statute made them sureties, so to speak. Now, under the Barrett law as enacted, the legislature created a uniform taxing district, over all of which the contractor had his lien. But, under the Barrett law as construed, an irregular district is created, without any valid reason inhering in the subject-matter of the act to warrant the irregularity, and the lien of the contractor is to that extent diminished. If A owns a parcel having 50 feet frontage and 150 feet depth, and B owns a parcel having 50 feet frontage and 20 feet depth, and C owns a parcel having 50 feet width and 130 feet depth, and lying back of B's parcel, it seems to me that if A is liable for actual special benefits on his 7,500 square feet, and B is liable on his 1,000 square feet, and C is not liable at all on his 6,500 square feet, not only is the taxing district irregular without reason, but the parties are not subjected to a "uniform and equal rate of assessment." The notice provided for in § 7 is not sufficient to give the council jurisdiction over any subject except "objections," nor any person except one "aggrieved." In Kuntz v. Sumption, 117 Ind. 1, 7, 2 L. R. A. 658, 19 N. E. 476, the court said of the board of equalization statute: "It does provide notice sufficient for two classes of judgment, but for no others. It provides for notice sufficient as to all general changes in the levy, and sufficient as to all who have complaints to make, and over these matters jurisdiction arises when the notice is given as the statute directs. But there is no provision for notice to the individual taxpayer whose list is to be added to or whose valuation is to be increased. . . . This notice, it is obvious, cannot require every taxpayer in the county to be in attendance at the meeting of the board to see that no additions are made to his list." The contract is made between the contractor and the council for the city. Under the Barrett law as enacted, the liability of the city was limited to the cost of street and alley crossings, and under § 7 the council had no discretion and no duty but to see that the balance of the cost was properly apportioned among the property owners according to frontage. The council for the city has control of the expenditure of the general fund; but, under the Barrett law as enacted, no conflict of interest arose among the council and the property owners and the contractor. Under the Barrett law as construed, however, a three-cornered conflict of interest at once arises, and the council is made the exclusive and final judge in its own case. In Huntington County Comrs. v. Heaston, 144 Ind. 583, 41 N. E. 457, 43 N. E. 651, it was held that a board of county commissioners, in allowing or disallowing claims against the county, acted merely in the capacity of an auditing committee. The court said: "If it was a suit against the county for the recovery of money, in the sense urged by counsel, then the claimant was the plaintiff and the county the defendant, and the commissioners were in the discharge of a double duty—acting as a court, and also as the representative of the defendant,—or otherwise the county could not be said to be in court. Such a construction as contended for apparently leads to an absurdity. It would follow that the court and the party defendant were virtually the same. It is an axiom of the law that no man can be a judge in his own case." A proper method of giving the people "due process of law" is illustrated in our statute in reference to the opening of streets. In that statute it is recognized that the general treasury will be subjected to an indefinite liability, and the city is not made the exclusive and final judge in its own case. On the whole, it seems to me that my brethren, in steering away from the rock of Scylla, have plunged into the whirlpool of Charybdis.

Auburn F. PEARL

v.

WEST END STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A plaintiff in an action for negligent injuries acts at his peril in following the suggestion of defendant's physician, who has been sent to examine him, to try standing on the injured leg after he and his physician have stated that he cannot bear his weight upon it.
2. A physician acting for defendant in making a physical examination of plaintiff in an action for negligent injuries is an independent contractor, and not a servant or agent, so as to charge defendant with liability for his acts.

NOTE.—Obeying or disobeying physician as affecting remedy of injured person against one who injured him.

- I. Scope of note.
- II. Effect of obeying improper directions.
- III. Effect of disobeying directions.

I. Scope of note.

This note is limited to the effect of obeying or disobeying a physician, on the remedy of the injured person against the person injuring him, where the injury is by a third person, and not by the physician himself, through the improper performance of his duties. Malpractice cases have been excluded, with the exception of a few having a special bearing upon the question of the effect of obeying or disobeying a physician's directions, with reference to personal injuries, and which lay down rules which would seem to apply equally to either class of cases.

II. Effect of obeying improper directions.

PEARL v. WEST END STREET R. CO., so far as it holds that an injured person following an improper suggestion made by a physician in the employ of the one who injured him, or by a physician other than his own, acts at his peril, and cannot hold the author of the original injury for an increase or aggravation of the injury thereby caused, seems to be a pioneer case.

The holding in that case, however, that a physician employed by the person causing an injury is an independent contractor, and not an agent or servant of the person employing him, for whose negligent acts the employer would be liable, finds support in South Florida R. Co. v. Price, 32 Fla. 46, 18 So. 638, in which it was held that a railroad company employing a physician and surgeon to furnish medical or surgical aid to sick or injured employees performs its entire duty in that respect, if it owes any, when it employs a person of ordinary competency and skill in the profession, and is not liable to an employee whose arm was broken in a collision, though he faithfully carried out all of the physician's orders relating to the care of the arm, where it was set in such an unskilled and negligent manner as to render it ill shaped, and of no use to him in the performance of manual labor.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Middlesex County after verdict for defendant, for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused to plaintiff by negligence of a physician sent by defendant to examine plaintiff as to the extent of personal injuries for which he had brought suit against defendant. Judgment on the verdict.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Conrad Reno, for plaintiff:

There was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that Dr. Hubbard was negligent in his manner of conducting his examination of the plaintiff.

Harriott v. Plimpton, 166 Mass. 585, 44 N. E. 992; Wilnot v. Howard, 39 Vt. 447, 94 Am. Dec. 338; Hathorn v. Richmond, 48 Vt. 557; Chamberlin v. Morgan, 68 Pa. 168:

The opposite rule would appear to prevail when the improper directions followed by an injured person are those of his own physician, or a physician under whose charge he is placed for the purpose of being cured.

Thus, a party injured by the negligence of another is bound to use ordinary care to effect his restoration or cure, and he is not responsible for a mistake, and, when he acts in good faith under the direction of the physician, the mistake of the latter in the treatment will not shield the wrongdoer. Caven v. Troy, 15 App. Div. 163, 44 N. Y. Supp. 244.

And a person injured in consequence of a defective highway, who employs a surgeon of ordinary professional knowledge and skill, and follows his necessary directions, is entitled to recover the full amount of his damages from the town, though the surgeon treated the injury unskillfully, and by such unskillful treatment prevented him from recovering as soon as he would have recovered under skillful treatment. Stover v. Bluehill, 51 Me. 439.

And the amount of compensation of one whose foot was caught in a hole in a sidewalk, whereby her leg was broken, should not be reduced by reason of any wrong treatment the physician may have given or administered, if she followed his directions in her conduct and use of her limb, even though such conduct or use was not proper, and aggravated the injury. Goshen v. England, 119 Ind. 368, 5 L. R. A. 258, 21 N. E. 977.

And where an employee of a railroad company, while engaged in his employment, stumbles over a cinder pile negligently left by the company, and is thrown to the ground, and his foot is caught and crushed by the drive-wheel of an engine, and he allows his foot to be amputated on the advice of a competent and efficient physician, the amputation is the negligence of the railroad company for which it is liable, whether or not the surgeon makes a mistake in advising it. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Doyle (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 461.

So, one whose arm is broken by the negligence of another, who employs physicians, surgeons, and nurses of ordinary skill in their profession, using ordinary care in their selection, and follows their direction, is not the insurer that they will be guilty of no negligence or error of judgment; and where, through some unskillful or negligent act on their part, the parts of his arm become separated, resulting Gates v. Fleischer, 67 Wis. 504, 30 N. W. 674; Wright v. Hardy, 22 Wis. 348.

An experiment upon an injured person always involves danger, and no physician or surgeon should make such an experiment as Dr. Hubbard made in this case, especially as he was not in the employ of the plaintiff, but in the employ of the defendant.

Slater v. Baker, 2 Wils. 359; Chamberlin v. Morgan, 68 Pa. 168.

The facts would have warranted the jury in finding that the plaintiff was injured by Dr. Hubbard's negligence.

Brooks v. Rochester R. Co. 156 N. Y. 244, 50 N. E. 945; DuBoise v. Decker, 130 N. Y. 325, 14 L. R. A. 429, 29 N. E. 313; Harriott v. Plimpton, 166 Mass. 585, 44 N. E. 992; Hathorn v. Richmond, 48 Vt. 557; Gates v. Fleischer, 67 Wis. 504, 30 N. W. 674.

The evidence warranted the jury in finding that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care during Dr. Hubbard's examination, and that he did not assume the risk of injury arising from Dr. Hubbard's negligence.

If the plaintiff had refused to try the experiment of standing on his left leg, when Dr. Hubbard insisted upon it, the defendant would have proved such refusal in the action arising out of the car accident, and would have argued that the plaintiff had refused to submit to a reasonable test of his physical condition. The plaintiff acted under this compulsion, and in reliance upon the supposed superior knowledge of Dr. Hubbard.

McKee v. Tourtellotte, 167 Mass. 69, 48 L. R. A. 542, 44 N. E. 1071; Burgess v. Davis Sulphur Ore Co. 165 Mass. 71, 42 N. E. 501.

Dr. Hubbard was employed by the defendant for its own benefit and information to exin a false joint, the party responsible for the breaking of the arm will be held to answer for the false joint, as the injury resulting from the mistake of the physicians, surgeons, and nurses is to be regarded as part of the immediate and direct damages resulting from the breaking of the arm. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Bluhm, 109 Ill. 20, 50 Am. Rep. 601.

If a reputable physician was employed to care for an injured arm, who treated it as long as he deemed proper, and his directions were followed, the injured person cannot be charged with negligence because the result was not what was expected. Strudgeon v. Sand Beach, 107 Mich. 496, 65 N. W. 616.

Where a person, injured by the negligence of another acting in good faith, consulted a competent physician, who advised him to take exercise, which advice he followed, it shields him against the charge that he recklessly, wilfully, or carelessly exposed his health or retarded his recovery; and evidence of such advice is competent in an action for the injury, not to cast upon the defendant any damage which his negligence did not occasion, but to show that the plaintiff acted in good faith and used proper care, to mitigate the damage which such negligence did occasion. Lyons v. Erie R. Co. 57 N. Y. 489.

So, in McGarrahan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 171 Mass. 211, 50 N. E. 610, it was held that improper treatment of a patient by a physician does not relieve from liability the person causing the injury, where the patient used ordinary care in procuring the physician, his duty being fully discharged in the use of such ordinary care in procuring a reputable physician, and the same care in following his instructions.

And in Sauter v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 50, 23 Am. Rep. 18, holding a defendant liable for a negligent injury to another which would have caused death, where the injured person employed a competent surgeon, who, in performing an operation, made a mistake sufficient of itself to cause death, it was said, following Lyons v. Erie R. Co. 57 N. Y. 489, supra, that if one who is injured by the negligence of another acts in good faith under the advice of a competent physician, even if it is erroneous, he may recover, and that the error is no shield to the wrongdoer.

From the above cases the rule appears to be that one who acts upon an improper suggestion made by a physician not in his employ does so at his own risk, and cannot recover against one who injured him for any enhancement of the injury thereby caused; and, though the physician may have been employed by the person causing the injury, he is an independent contractor, and not an agent or servant for whose act in making the improper suggestion the employer would be liable. But if the physician is one employed by or for the injured person to treat his injuries, the person injuring him is responsible in damages for the whole injury, though the injury was enhanced by obeying mistaken directions of the physician, where reasonable care was exercised in the selection of a physician of ordinary skill.

III. Effect of disobeying directions.

Where an injured person disobeys the directions of his physician, and thereby enhances or aggravates the injury, the rule seems to be universal that such disobedience will prevent a recovery to the extent that the damages were thereby enhanced or increased; and some of the cases have laid it down without apparent qualification.

Thus, if a person injured by the negligence of another employs, to care for his injuries, a reputable physician, but negligently fails to follow directions as to treatment of his injuries, and thereby his damages are aggravated, that aggravation should be considered, and should reduce his claim. Strudgeon v. Sand Beach, 107 Mich. 496, 65 N. W. 616.

And one who suffers an injury from catching her foot in a hole in a sidewalk, breaking her limb, cannot recover damages from the city for any increased pain or deformity caused by her own negligence or carelessness in the use of the limb after the injury, or by failure to follow directions of her physician with reference to its use. Goshen v. England, 119 Ind. 368, 5 L. R. A. 253, 21 N. E. 977.

And while one who unlawfully sells intoxicating liquors to a person, who becomes quarrelsome and makes a disturbance, and is shot in the leg and injured in the progress thereof, and who afterwards disobeys the orders of his physician and uses the leg, after which it has to be amputated and his death results, would be liable to the deceased's wife, under the civil damage act, if the death could be regarded as the natural and proximate cause of the intoxication, if the death was the consequence of disobeying the physician's orders a new agency will intervene, and the liquor seller cannot be held responsible. Schmidt v. Mitchell, 84 Ill. 195, 25 Am. Rep. 446.

And it is a material question for the jury, in an action by the wife under the civil damage act, against the person supplying the liquor, amine the plaintiff, who was then suffering from the effects of a fall from the defendant's car.

Dr. Hubbard was acting strictly within the scope of his employment by the defendant, and when he told the plaintiff to stand upon his left leg he was doing an act which was clearly within the scope of his employment. The defendant, therefore, is liable for such negligence of Dr. Hubbard.

Shattuck v. Bill, 142 Mass. 56, 7 N. E. 39; Zinn v. Rice, 161 Mass. 571, 37 N. E. 747; Richardson v. Carbon Hill Coal Co. 6 Wash. 52, 20 L. R. A. 338, 32 Pac. 1012; Texas & P. Coal Co. v. Connaughten, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 642, 50 S. W. 173; Hitchcock v. Burgett, 38 Mich. 501; Brackett v. Lubke, 4 Allen, 138, 81 Am. Dec. 694; Story, Agency, §§ 308, 452; Southern Exp. Co. v. Platten, 93 Fed. Rep. 936, 36 C. C. A. 46.

A person who employs an attorney-at-law to determine from the evidence whether the wound received was the cause of the death, or whether the death was the result of the misconduct on the part of the person injured in using his leg in disregard of the advice by the physician; and the exclusion of evidence as to such advice by the physician, and such disregard thereof, would be error. Ibid.

Likewise, the same or similar rules applicable to this subject have been laid down in a number of actions against physicians for malpractice with reference to personal injuries.

Thus, in Becker v. Janinski, 27 Abb. N. C. 45, 15 N. Y. Supp. 875, it was said that a patient must obey the orders, and follow the directions, of his physician.

And in McCandless v. McWha, 22 Pa. 261, and in Haire v. Reese, 7 Phila. 138, it was held to be the duty of a patient to conform to the necessary prescription and treatment of his physician, if they be such as a physician or surgeon of ordinary skill and care would adopt or sanction; and if he will not, or under the pressure of pain cannot, do so, the physician is not responsible for injury resulting therefrom.

And in Jones v. Angell, 95 Ind. 376, it was held to be the duty of a patient to submit to the treatment prescribed by his physician, and to follow the necessary or reasonable directions given by him, and that a refusal to adopt the remedies, or comply with the directions, of the physician, defeating the endeavors of the physician or aggravating the case, prevents a recovery for the consequences due to himself; and that calling the attention of the jury, in an action for the injuries, to the question of the plaintiff's neglect or refusal to obey his physician, is not improper, where there is evidence establishing, or strongly tending to establish, the fact alluded to.

So, in Geiselman v. Scott, 25 Ohio St. 86, it was held that a patient who is directed by his physician to observe absolute rest as a part of the treatment of an injured foot, such direction being one which would be adopted by a surgeon or physician of ordinary skill, who negligently fails to observe such direction, or purposely disobeys the same, cannot recover if such neglect or disobedience proximately contributes to the injury of which he complains, although it appears that the physician's negligence or want of skill also contributes to the injury.

And in Potter v. Warner, 91 Pa. 362, 36 Am. Rep. 668, it was held that if the parents of a boy run over and injured by a cattle car were in charge of and nursed him, and did not obey 49 L. R. A.

to do certain legal work for him is liable for the torts of his attorney committed upon a third person, while the attorney is acting within the scope of his employment.

Zinn v. Rice, 161 Mass. 571, 37 N. E. 747; Shattuck v. Bill, 142 Mass. 56, 7 N. E. 39.

A like principle has been applied to physicians who have been employed to do certain medical work for the benefit of their employer, and, while acting within the scope of their employment, injure a third person by some act of negligence.

Texas & P. Coal Co. v. Connaughten, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 642, 50 S. W. 173; Richardson v. Carbon Hill Coal Co. 6 Wash. 52, 20 L. R. A. 338, 32 Pac. 1012.

The doctrine of ultra vires does not apply. A corporation is liable for the negligence of its employees to the same extent that natural persons are liable.

Nims v. Mount Hermon Boys' School, 160

the directions of the physician in regard to the treatment and care of their son during the time, but disregarded the same, and thereby contributed to the injuries of which he complained, he cannot recover; and it is not necessary that the negligence of each party be equal, to defeat a recovery.

And in Swanson v. French, 92 Iowa, 695, 61 N. W. 407, it was held that an instruction that if a plaintiff disobeyed the orders of his physician by removing the splints from his leg, and by using it before receiving permission of the physician, and while it is not sufficiently recovered, and procured crutches, and went about against the orders of the physician, and became intoxicated and used his leg while in that condition, and by reason of such use contributed in any degree directly to the injury of his leg complained of by him, he could not recover, announces a correct rule of law, and is not objectionable as shifting the burden of proof of contributory negligence to the defendant.

And in Whitesell v. Hill (Iowa) 66 N. W. 894, an instruction placing the duty of following a physician's directions upon a person injured, with reference to the treatment of the injury, and relating to the care he should use, and directing the jury to disallow any claims of the plaintiff which resulted from his failure to obey such directions or instructions, was held to be justified by a claim on the part of the plaintiff that a bandage was negligently placed on his arm after the reduction of the fracture, causing him excessive pain, which was attempted to be met by evidence that directions were given to the plaintiff, which, if followed, would have relieved the pain and saved the trouble complained of.

Other cases, however, show that the rule is a qualified one, both with reference to the nature of the directions disobeyed, and to the competency or capacity to obey of the person injured, the rule probably being that the remedy would not be affected by disobeying a palpably erroneous direction, or by the disobedience of a person who was insane, or otherwise incompetent to understand or act upon the direction.

Thus, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that a patient may not, without imputation of negligence, which will prevent a recovery against one who negligently caused him an injury, trust to natural results without the complication of scientific experiments. Sullivan v. Tioga R. Co. 112 N. Y. 643, 20 N. E. 569.

And the question whether the refusal of a man, who had been injured by the negligence

Mass. 177, 22 L. R. A. 364, 35 N. E. 776; Donnelly v. Boston Catholic Cemetery Assn. 146 Mass. 163, 15 N. E. 505.

Messrs. M. F. Dickinson, Jr., and Walter Bates Farr, for defendant:

The defendant cannot be held liable in this action because the defendant failed in no duty which it owed to the plaintiff.

It is only when the employer and the employed stand in the relation of master and servant that the employer is liable for the negligence of a person employed, and then only if the acts complained of were done in the course of the servant's employment.

Hilliard v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 349, 63 Am. Dec. 743; Linton v. Smith, 8 Gray, 147.

Dr. Hubbard was employed by the defendant simply to make a physical examination of the plaintiff.

The employment of Dr. Hubbard was an independent employment, and he was an independent contractor.

Under such circumstances the employer is not liable for the negligence or unskillfulness of the person employed.

Harrison v. Collins, 86 Pa. 153, 27 Am. Rep. 699; Barry v. St. Louis, 17 Mo. 122; Sprout v. Hommingway, 14 Pick. 1, 25 Am. Dec. 350; Wood v. Cobb, 13 Allen, 58; Harding v. Boston, 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411; Stretton v. Holmes, 19 Ont. Rep. 286.

A corporation is not liable for the negligence and unskillfulness of a physician employed by it to attend and treat third persons, where it had not failed to exercise due care in selecting a competent person.

Union P. R. Co. v. Artist, 19 U. S. App. 612, 23 L. R. A. 581, 60 Fed. Rep. 367, 9 C. C. A. 14; Pierce v. Union P. R. Co. 32 U. S. App. 48, 66 Fed. Rep. 45, 13 C. C. A. 323; of another, to submit his leg to amputation in accordance with the advice of his physician, constitutes negligence on his part which will bar a recovery against the person causing the injury, is one for the jury, where the physician gave no assurance that the operation would change the apprehended result, but merely stated that it would have improved chances, and it appeared that in similar cases amputation had been omitted and the limb saved. Ibid.

So, the information which a surgeon may give to a patient concerning the nature of his malady is a circumstance which should be considered by the jury in determining the question whether the patient, in disobeying the instructions of the surgeon, was guilty of contributory negligence. Geiselman v. Scott, 25 Ohio St. 86.

And one who receives a physical injury at the hands of another cannot be expected to know in every instant the most prudent thing for him to do, and should not be held negligent because his sufferings are such that they impel him to a course unfavorable to his recovery, where there is but a mere scintilla of evidence that he knew that such course was unfavorable; and one who was injured by the negligent act of a railroad company will not be debarred from recovering the full amount of his damages by the testimony of his physician that he was an active, strong man, that it was impossible to control him, that he did not observe the strict quietude that he should have done, that his pain made him restless and uneasy, and that he thought exercise relieved his pain, which was a characteristic of the injury, where the witness does not say the injured person was told of the importance of keeping quiet, or that he knew that moving about would retard his recovery. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McMannewitz, 70 Tex. 73, 8 S. W. 66.

So, in McCandless v. McWha, 22 Pa. 261, it was said by Lewis, J., that a patient is bound to submit to such treatment as his surgeon prescribes, provided the treatment be such as a surgeon of ordinary skill would adopt or sanction; but if it be painful, injurious, and unskillful, he is not bound to imperil his health, and perhaps his life, by submission to it. And before a physician can shift the responsibility from himself to the patient, on the ground that the latter did not submit to the course recommended, it must be shown that the prescriptions were proper and adapted to the end in view, and it is incumbent on the surgeon to satisfy the jury on that point.

v. Decker, 130 N. Y. 325, 14 L. R. A. 429, 20 N. E. 813. But these were malpractice cases.

And in Chamberlain v. Morgan, 68 Pa. 168, which was an action for malpractice against a physician, it was held that evidence by a consulting physician that on examination of a girl whose arm was injured, in the presence of, and at the request of, her father, he proposed to put her under the influence of an anæsthetic, and attempt to reduce the fracture, and that the injury could then have been reduced, and that the father replied in her presence that so long as she was improving so fast he would not have it disturbed, is not admissible in an action brought by the girl, where the consulting physician had only been asked to examine the daughter's arm and give his opinion about it, as that did not oblige the father to adopt his advice.

So, as most insane persons are under compulsory medical treatment, they cannot be assumed to occupy the same moral and fiduciary relations to their medical attendants as do sane persons, and they are not bound to co-operate with their medical attendants in procuring a cure of their own persons as sane patients are. And their neglect or unwillingness to do so cannot be imputed to them as contributory negligence. But as insanity at law is a term of variable significance, covering different shades of mental unsoundness, there might be phases of it in which a patient would be capable of such negligence as would amount to contributory wrong on his part. People ex rel. Norton v. New York Hospital, 3 Abb. N. C. 229.

But the rule with reference to the degree of care required of a person injured by the negligence of another in the employment of a physician and surgeon, and in procuring and submitting to proper medical treatment, is not changed or affected by the fact that the person injured was himself a physician and surgeon. Boynton v. Somersworth, 58 N. H. 321.

Subsequent negligence, however, after the injury of one whose foot is caught in a hole in a sidewalk whereby her limb is broken, in the use of the limb, and in failing to follow the directions of her physician, does not bar a recovery against the city, but it can only be held liable for such damage as its negligence produced; and before a reduction of damages for the pain actually suffered and the deformity actually existing can be had, it must appear that the pain and deformity were increased by the negligence or failure to obey the instructions of the physician by the plaintiff. Goheen v. England, 119 Ind. 368, 5 L. R. A. 253, 21 N. E. 977.

A recovery is not barred by a mere failure to follow the physician's directions, but no dam-

Harriott v. Plimpton, 166 Mass. 585, 44 N. E. 992.

The plaintiff was not bound to obey Dr. Hubbard's directions, and if it were dangerous he knew it better than Dr. Hubbard could know. The maxim Volenti non fit injuria, therefore applies, and the plaintiff cannot complain of an injury which he caused himself, and to which he consented.

Holmes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action seeking to charge the defendant with the alleged results of a doctor's examination of the plaintiff. The plaintiff had had an accident, and had sued the defendant, whereupon the defendant forthwith sent a doctor to examine him. The plaintiff's trouble was in his left leg, and the doctor, after directing him to stand upon his right leg, told him to stand upon his left leg. The plaintiff said that he could not, and his own doctor also said that he could not bear his weight upon that leg. The examining doctor then told the plaintiff to "try standing on his left leg." The plaintiff tried it, fell, and attributes subsequent hysterical trouble to this cause. At the trial the judge directed a verdict for the defendant, and the case is here on exceptions.

It would be a strong thing to say that the ages should be allowed for an injurious effect resulting from such failure. Keyes v. Cedar Falls, 107 Iowa, 509, 78 N. W. 227.

And evidence in an action therefor proving the receipt of the injury, and that it occurred by reason of the negligence of the defendant and without the plaintiff's fault, and that she employed skilful physicians and surgeons to treat it, and that a deformity was caused thereby, establishes a cause of action for the pain suffered and the deformity existing; and if the defendant, to relieve itself from such liability, asserts that the pain and deformity were not the result of the injury, but were caused by the negligence of the plaintiff in the treatment of the limb after the injury and in failing to follow directions of her physician, the burden rests with him to establish the truth of such assertion. Goshen v. England, 119 Ind. 368, 5 L. R. A. 253, 21 N. E. 977.

And a person receiving a personal injury through the negligence of another is entitled 49 L. R. A.

evidence warranted finding anyone responsible for the accident except the plaintiff himself. The doctor's request that he should try standing on his left leg was not medical advice or direction upon a matter as to which the plaintiff had put himself in the doctor's hands. On the contrary, it came from one who avowedly was in an adverse interest, and who had no authority of any kind. Furthermore, it recognized in its very words that perhaps the plaintiff was right in thinking that he could not stand in that way. It only called on him for an experiment in a region of admitted doubt. How far the experiment should go necessarily was left to the plaintiff himself when he should make it. If he carried it too far, the doctor was not to blame. See Latter v. Braddell, 50 L. J. C. P. N. S. 166, a much stronger case than the present.

But, further, the doctor was not an agent or servant of the defendant in making his examination. He was an independent contractor. There is no more distinct calling than that of the doctor, and none in which the employee is more distinctly free from the control or direction of his employer. See Linton v. Smith, 8 Gray, 147; Milligan v. Wedge, 12 Ad. & El. 737, 741, 742. In this case the doctor was informing himself, according to the suggestions of his own judgment in order to advise and perhaps to testify for the defendant. We must assume, in the absence of other evidence than his profession and his purpose, that what he should do and how he should do it was left wholly to him. See Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 424, 34 Am. Rep. 675; Secord v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 5 McCrary, 515, 18 Fed. Rep. 221, 225.

An argument is addressed to us drawn from the liability of litigant for his attorney. Shattuck v. Bill, 142 Mass. 56, 7 N. E. 30. But no argument can be trusted that relies on that analogy. Perhaps the liability for an attorney rests on the fact that the very essence of his employment was to represent the person of a party to a suit. Attornatus fere in omnibus personam domini representat. Bracton, 342a. It must be remembered that this right of representation in a lawsuit was conceived with difficulty.

to recover of the person causing the injury full compensation for all the mental and physical injury that he sustained by reason of the negligence and carelessness of such person: and the jury, in an action therefor, is not justified in inferring that if the injured person did not regard the advice of his physician the injury was thereby aggravated so that he would not be entitled to recover. Lawrence v. Housatonic R. Co. 29 Conn. 390.

These cases seem to establish the rule, with reference to disobeying the directions of the physician in charge, that if the injuries are thereby enhanced or increased the person injured cannot recover of the person injuring him for the increased injury. But the right to recover for the injury as it originally existed would not be affected, and the rule would not apply to disobedience of a direction which was erroneous to the knowledge of the patient, or of a person who was incompetent to understand or obey.

and only gradually granted, and, as first allowed, seems to have been worked out through some sort of fictitious identification.

Whether for that reason or another, attorneys sometimes have been spoken of as servants (Anonymous, 1 Mod. 209, 210), and their acts within the scope of their employment always have been said to be the acts of their clients (Parsons v. Loyd, 3 Wils. 341, 345; Barker v. Braham, 2 W. Bl. 866, 868, 869, 3 Wils. 368, 374; Bates v. Pilling, 6 Barn. & C. 38, 41; Nicholberry v. Lee, 3 Hill, 523; McIlvoy v. Wright, 137 Mass. 207).

In short, the liability of client for attorney is the result of a special series of events, and cannot be allowed to found a general rule.

We are of opinion that on one or the other of the foregoing grounds the direction was right.

In the view which we take, the exceptions to the exclusion of evidence become unimportant. The questions excluded went to the general skill of the doctor's examination. This was immaterial, as the ground of the claim was a specific fact, definitely stated.

Judgment on the verdict.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

(.....Wyo.....)

1. The supreme court, having jurisdiction to issue writs of habeas corpus, may issue a writ to release from imprisonment one entitled to relief, although a writ has been previously refused or dismissed by a lower court, if the statute does not provide for appeal, and plainly contemplates repeated applications for the writ.
2. When any constitutional right or immunity of accused is violated in a proceeding for contempt in refusing to give testimony, a judgment of conviction is void.
3. A court loses jurisdiction of an accused person by wrongfully interpreting his constitutional rights or immunities against him, or by refusing him a constitutional right, so that its judgment against him is void.
4. Want of jurisdiction to punish a witness for contempt for refusing to answer questions tending to incriminate himself, because punishment will violate his constitutional rights, will entitle a witness to release on habeas corpus in case of imprisonment, although the conviction might be reviewed by writ of error.
5. A witness may be compelled to answer a question against his claim of privilege on the ground that his answer might tend to incriminate him, if the court decides that there is no tangible or substantial probability that any direct answer to the question would implicate him.
6. One charged with compounding a felony by refusing to testify against accused cannot, although the information against him has been dismissed, be compelled to give evidence to prove the commission of the felony, since that would be one link in establishing his guilt of compounding it.
7. A constitutional provision that no one shall be compelled to give incriminating evidence against himself will protect against the extortion of the evidence, although, if given, it could not be used in any prosecution against the witness.

NOTE.—For habeas corpus to review void sentence, see note to Blon's Appeal (Conn.) 11 L. R. A. 694; and Stoutenburgh v. Frazier (D. C.) 48 L. R. A. 220.

For habeas corpus to review commitment for contempt in refusing to give up books and papers, see Ex parte Clarke (Cal.) 46 L. R. A. 835.

8. The question of the good faith of a witness in claiming privilege against giving self-incriminating testimony does not depend upon his attitude towards the prosecution, but upon his belief as to the effect of his answer.

9. That the privilege of a witness to refuse to give self-incriminating testimony is subject to abuse cannot be considered by the courts in determining the validity of a conviction for contempt for refusing to answer, further than to guard against such abuses as far as consistent with the maintenance of the right itself.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the release of petitioner from the custody of the sheriff of Laramie County to which he had been committed for contempt in refusing to answer questions propounded to him as a witness. Petitioner discharged.

Statement by Coom, J.:

This is a writ of habeas corpus. The prosecuting attorney of Laramie county, upon information furnished him by the plaintiff, made complaint before a justice of the peace against one Oliver C. Hough, charging him with having obtained the sum of $1,130 from plaintiff by false pretenses. He and one James Raff, also charged with the same offense, had left this state, and gone to the state of Colorado; and the plaintiff made the necessary affidavit to obtain a requisition, and they were arrested, and brought back to this state for trial. Upon the preliminary examination the plaintiff was placed upon the witness stand by the prosecution, and asked the following questions:

Q. Did you purchase, or attempt to purchase, from the defendants, James Raff and Oliver C. Hough, or either of them, a bunch of cattle, or any interest in any cattle, between the 1st day of July, A. D. 1899, and the 15th day of July, A. D. 1899, or about that time? If so, state the particulars of the purchase, or attempted purchase.

Q. If any such purchase, or attempt to purchase, was made, state where the defendants, or either of them, stated at the time said cattle were situated, or under whose charge.

Q. If any such purchase, or attempt to purchase, was made, state fully all the facts and circumstances leading up to the said transaction, and all the facts of the transaction itself.

Q. You may state fully what, if any, admissions the defendants James Raff and Oliver C. Hough, alias Clifford W. Lang, or either of them, made to you in regard to this transaction; stating the date, time, and place, and who was present, if anybody, and all the facts and circumstances of such admissions, if any were made.

Q. State fully and particularly what money, if any, was paid, either by you or your direction, to the defendants, or either of them, as purchase price, or on the purchase price, for the cattle, or the interest of the defendants, or either of them, in the cattle, and all the facts in relation to such payment.

Q. If any purchase, or attempted purchase, was made, state whether or not you obtained any cattle, by your purchase, or attempted purchase; and, if your answer is in the negative, state fully all you know of the reasons why you did not obtain any cattle, or any interest in any cattle, by your purchase, or attempted purchase.

He declined to answer all of them, upon the ground that the answers to them would tend to criminate him. In the meantime the prosecuting attorney had had some difficulty in getting the plaintiff, the prosecuting witness, before the justice to testify in the case, and had filed a complaint against him, charging him with compounding the felony with which the defendants were charged. The justice decided that the plaintiff must answer the questions, and upon his continued refusal adjudged him to be in contempt, and committed him to jail until he should consent to answer. The plaintiff then sued out a writ of habeas corpus before Hon. Richard H. Scott, the district judge of the first district. Judge Scott, upon the hearing, adjudged that the plaintiff was properly imprisoned for his failure to answer, and remanded him to jail. The plaintiff then presented another petition for the writ of habeas corpus to one of the judges of this court, who issued it, and made it returnable before the supreme court.

Messrs. R. W. Breckons and W. R. Stoll, for petitioner:

A person summoned as a witness before any inquisitional body, judicial or legislative, is absolutely privileged from answering a question put to him, if he will state upon his oath, in answer to such question, that he refuses to answer the same for the reason that his answer thereto, if given, will subject him to an indictment for a crime; and if such an answer be not deemed sufficient by the inquisitional body, and the witness be imprisoned for contempt for refusing further to answer, he will be entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus.

When the court can see from the situation in which the witness is placed, or the circumstances by which he is surrounded, that the questions are of such a nature that possible answers could be given to them which might tend to criminate the witness, either by showing him guilty of the particular crime charged, or of some other crime, or which might form a link in the chain of evidence which might be made the foundation of a criminal charge, the court will not compel the witness to answer the questions, provided he states on oath that answers to the same will tend to criminate him.

In all cases where the privilege is claimed, the mere claim of the privilege itself necessarily draws with it the legal conclusion, first, that the witness is actually guilty of a crime; or, second, that by disclosing the actual facts of the transaction he will disclose some fact or circumstance which would tend to form a link of incriminating evidence to be thrown around him; or third, the witness may be entirely innocent, yet he may be so situated with relation to guilty parties, and the facts and circumstances which surround him may be such, that any answer that he might make would form or tend to form a link in the chain of incriminating circumstances which might be taken as the basis of a criminal prosecution, or as the basis of a criminal complaint.

The questions in and of themselves show the relator so situated with relation to time, place, and circumstances that answers which he might make to the questions would clearly tend to criminate him.

It is a presumption of law that, if a witness answers, he will answer truthfully and fully. The law cannot presume anything else, and if the witness answers at all as to a transaction the court will compel him to answer fully.

Chamberlain v. Willson, 12 Vt. 491, 36 Am. Dec. 356; Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195; Broicu v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 40 L. ed. 819, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 369, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644; Ex parte Senior, 37 Fla. 1, 32 L. R. A. 133, 19 So. 652.

It is not the province of the court to say that, simply because an answer to a particular question might not tend to criminate the witness in the particular offense that is then being tried, therefore the witness cannot claim his privilege.

The compounding of a felony embraces two elements: first, the felony itself; and, second, the compounding. There can be no conviction of compounding a felony without first establishing the existence of the felony. A witness already charged with compounding a felony, or a witness whose answers might disclose the compounding of a felony, certainly cannot be called upon to prove the felony, because by doing so he is compelled to prove a part of the cause against himself.

United States v. Lynn, 2 Cranch, C. C. 309, Fed. Cas. No. 15,649; Ex parte Irvine, 74 Fed. Rep. 954.

The fact that when a witness is called to testify he claims his constitutional privilege, that it appears that he has made an affidavit, or that he has testified in some other proceeding on the same matter, can in no manner whatever impair the efficacy of the constitutional privilege; nor can the fact that the county attorney has promised that he will not bring any criminal action against the witness, or that he dismissed a criminal action against the witness that has already been begun, cut any figure whatever in the case.

Bellinger v. People, 8 Wend. 595; Cullen v. Com. 24 Gratt. 624; Temple v. Com. 75 Va. 802; Muller v. State, 11 Lea. 18; Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145.

The jurisdiction of a committing court is considered only as to such contempt as involves some idea of delinquency or wrongdoing on the part of the party committed, and cannot extend to calling an act a contempt which is indifferent or innocent,—such, for instance, as claiming a constitutional privilege.

It certainly cannot be contended that in such an important matter as a citizen's constitutional rights the supreme court of this state can pass no judgment upon the question by virtue of the fact that either a justice of the peace or a district court has passed upon it.

It does not matter whether a habeas corpus proceeding grows out of a civil action, or how it originates, it is always an original proceeding; and a statute which gives an appeal from a final order affecting a substantial right, made in a special proceeding, does not relate to a habeas corpus proceeding, but only to a civil proceeding for the enforcement and protection of private rights, or the redress or prevention of private wrongs.

Re Fencelon, 37 Wis. 231.

When a statute permits an appeal to be taken in a habeas corpus proceeding, from the determination of a court, no appeal will lie where the determination was not by a court, but by a judge.

Corn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A number of questions arise in this case, none of which have been passed upon by this court. Some of them are of serious importance, and, owing to the difference in the habeas corpus statutes in the various states and some conflict in the decisions, of considerable difficulty. Therefore, while the circumstances of the case have urged an immediate decision, we have deemed it better to take sufficient time to give the propositions a careful consideration, and endeavor to reach a conclusion which could be relied on as a safe precedent in so serious a matter as the imprisonment of a citizen as a penalty for exercising what he claims to be a constitutional right.

Counsel for the defendant contend that, the district judge having adjudicated the question of the legality of plaintiff's imprisonment upon the same facts, this court ought not to again consider it; that the plaintiff might have come to this court by petition in error, and should be required to avail himself of that remedy. All the authorities agree that there is no appeal from a hearing upon habeas corpus, unless the right is conferred by statute. In many habeas corpus cases, as, for instance, where the custody of children is involved, it is, without doubt, an appropriate method of obtaining the opinion of the court of last resort. In cases like the present, where the petitioner is imprisoned, and other proceedings are awaiting the decision of the questions, the necessary delays incident to a review by petition in error make it subject to serious objections, and, if there is no other remedy, entirely inappropriate and inadequate. We do not deem it necessary to decide, in this case, however, whether proceedings in error are authorized by our statutes; for we think that our habeas corpus act, when considered in connection with the constitutional provisions bearing upon the question, clearly contemplates that the writ shall issue, and a hearing be had, when, upon the showing of the petitioner, he would be entitled to relief, notwithstanding the fact that the writ may have been refused, or may have been issued and afterwards dismissed, upon a hearing by another judge.

It is said that "by the great preponderance of authority the principle of res judicata, where not otherwise provided by statute, has no application to habeas corpus cases, and a decision on one writ is no bar to the issuance of and proceedings on a subsequent habeas corpus." 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1070. In Ex parte Lawrence, 5 Binn. 304, where the case had already been heard upon a habeas corpus upon the same evidence by the common pleas, who remanded the prisoner, the supreme court of Pennsylvania refused to issue a second writ, but say in their decision: "We do not think that the act of assembly obliges this court to grant a habeas corpus, where the case has been already heard upon the same evidence by another court; and we do not think it expedient in this case, because it has already been heard upon the same evidence, and the party is not without remedy, as he may resort to a hominem replegiando. The court are not, however, to be understood as saying that they have not authority to issue a habeas corpus in such a case, if they should think it expedient." And this was not a case where the applicant was imprisoned, but involved the question of the right to his freedom of one held as a slave. In a case before Mr. Justice Nelson, at chambers, it was objected that the decision of the circuit court of the United States upon the return of a former writ of habeas corpus, remanding the prisoner, was conclusive, and a bar to any subsequent inquiry into the same matters by virtue of this writ; but, after reviewing the authorities, the justice said: "The decision, therefore, of the circuit court, upon a previous writ of habeas corpus obtained on behalf of the prisoner, refusing to discharge him, will not relieve me from inquiring into the legality of the imprisonment under the order of the commissioner upon the present application. Ex parte Kaine, 3 Blatchf. 5, Fed. Cas. No. 7,597. And upon a hearing the prisoner was discharged. In People ex rel. Lawrence v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 182, the relator was arrested upon a warrant of the governor of the state of New York, upon the requisition of the governor of Michigan. A writ of habeas corpus was issued out of the supreme court and upon a demurrer to the return before the court of oyer and terminer there was judgment against the relator, and the writ was dismissed. Afterwards another writ of habeas corpus was issued out of the circuit court of the United States, and there was judgment against the relator, dismissing the writ and remanding the relator. Afterwards another writ of habeas corpus was issued, and returned before Mr. Justice Brady of the supreme court, and there was again judgment, dismissing the writ and remanding the relator to the custody of the sheriff. The proceedings before Judge Brady were affirmed by the supreme court on certiorari, and the writ of certiorari dismissed. The court of appeals, on error to the supreme court, discharged the relator; and the court says: "We are of opinion that the previous adjudications in proceedings on habeas corpus are no answer to a new writ, issued on the application of the relator. The case is not within the principle of Mercein v. People ex rel. Barry, 25 Wend. 64, 35 Am. Dec. 653, where the controversy related to the right to the custody of an infant child. In this case the relator is restrained of his liberty; and a decision under one writ, refusing to discharge him, did not bar the issuing of a second writ by another court or officer,"—referring to Ex parte Kaine, 3 Blatchf. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 7,597, and the English cases of Ex parte Parlington, 13 Mees. & W. 679, and Re v. Suddis, 1 East, 306. People ex rel. Lawrence v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 182. And the point was again decided in the same way in People ex rel. McIntyre v. Hurlburt, 67 How. Pr. 362. It may be here remarked that in the case of Re Graham, 7 Wash. 237, 34 Pac. 931, relied upon by counsel for the respondent, where the supreme court of that state denied an application because the matter had once been heard upon habeas corpus before a judge of the superior court, they in terms decide only a question of practice. While admitting their jurisdiction, and conceding that the practice is different in some states, they hold that the Constitution does not require them to take jurisdiction under such circumstances, and they remit the applicant to his right of appeal, which seems to be provided for in that state. And it is to be observed, further, that, even upon the questions decided, the decision was by a divided court; two out of the five judges dissenting. Brown, Jurisdiction of Courts, § 111, the latest text-book to which we have access on the subject, says: "A denial of the petition is not a bar to a second writ; but in some states the petitioner must show whether the question has been passed upon by any of the courts. The doctrine of res judicata has no application to this proceeding, except where the statute provides for an appeal, which is the case in some states." And in the note he cites Hawes, Jur. § 181. "A decision under one writ of habeas corpus, refusing to discharge a person restrained of his liberty, is no bar to a second writ by another court or officer. Re Perkins, 2 Cal. 424; Ex parte Ellis, 11 Cal. 223-225; Re Ring, 28 Cal. 251; Yates v. People, 6 Johns. 416; Re Snell, 31 Minn. 110, 16 N. W. 692; Bell v. State use of Miller, 4 Gill, 303, 45 Am. Dec. 130; Ex parte Kaine, 3 Blatchf. 2, 5, Fed. Cas. No. 7,597; Bonnett ex rel. Newmeyer v. Bonnett, 61 Iowa, 200, 47 Am. Rep. 810, 16 N. W. 91; Ex parte Foster, 5 Tex. App. 643, 32 Am. Rep. 577; Ex parte Robinson, 6 McLean, 356, Fed. Cas. No. 11,935; Ex parte Campbell, 20 Ala. 93; Ex parte Lawrence, 5 Binn. 304; People ex rel. Lawrence v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 185. A decision on habeas corpus is not appealable, or subject to review. The doctrine of res judicata has no application to such a case; but it seems that a discharge under a writ of habeas corpus by a court of competent jurisdiction, being in favor of personal liberty, is final and conclusive, and a rearrest under the same charge is unlawful. McFarland v. Johnson, 27 Tex. 105; Re Ring, 28 Cal. 251; Lea v. White, 4 Sneed, 73, 67 Am. Dec. 599; People ex rel. Eldridge v. Fancher, 1 Hun, 28; Re Curley, 34 Iowa, 185; Hammond v. People ex rel. Vacaro, 32 Ill. 446, 83 Am. Unquestionably the matter may be regulated by statute, provided the statutory regulations do not infringe upon the constitutional right to the writ. But the clear intention of our statute is to preserve the right to repeated applications. By subdivision 4, § 1264, Rev. Stat. it is provided that the petition for the writ must state "that the legality of the imprisonment has not already been adjudged upon a prior proceeding of the same character to the best knowledge and belief of the applicant, or, if so previously adjudged upon, setting forth as fully as practicable the facts of such previous hearing, with a copy of all the papers connected therewith, or a satisfactory reason for the absence of such copy or copies." If a former adjudication is to bar a second writ, the latter part of the subdivision, providing for setting out the facts of such former hearing, is useless and absurd, and in reason it must be presumed that the subdivision would end with the requirement that the petition should state that there had been no such former adjudication. The same considerations apply to subdivision 5 of the same section: "It must also state whether application for the writ has been made to and refused by any court or judge, and, if such application has been made, a copy of the petition in that case, with the reasons for the refusal thereto appended, must be produced, or satisfactory reasons given for the failure to do so." The requirement that the facts of such previous hearing, or the reasons for such refusal, must be set out, necessarily implies the power and the duty of the court or judge to whom the second application is made to consider and pass upon the facts of such previous hearing or the reasons for such refusal. These sections are also especially persuasive of this view, in connection with the fact that no other method of review is provided for in the act itself; and this conclusion is further fortified by the fact that the act provides in what cases the writ may be refused, and those in which a former adjudication has been had is not one of them, but it is permitted to be refused only when the application is made to a more remote court or judge, and no sufficient reason stated for not making the application to the more convenient court or judge, or when, upon the showing of the petitioner, the plaintiff would not be entitled to any relief. The statute does not authorize the refusal of the writ in any other cases. The habeas corpus act, in the arrangement of our statutes, is not included in the division of the Code of Civil Procedure entitled "Special Proceedings;" nor is it incorporated in the Code at all, as is done in some of the states. The act, which was adopted under the territorial government, attempted to confer jurisdiction of the writ also upon the probate judges. They were not, ordinarily, persons learned, or alleged to be learned, in the law; and a construction of the act which would make their judgments final in so vital a matter, involving the constitutional rights and the personal liberty of the citizen, or, at the best, to make a review of their judgments dependent upon the doubtful application of the provisions of the Civil Code to the subject, would expose the lawmaking power of the territory to the charge of enacting rash and ill-considered legislation. By § 3, art. 5, of the Constitution, this court has original jurisdiction in habeas corpus, and each of the judges is given power to issue the writ, and make it returnable before himself, or the supreme court, or any district court of the state, or any judge thereof. In view of all these considerations,—the evident purpose of the Constitution that the writ shall be conveniently obtained, shown in conferring original jurisdiction upon all the courts and judges of the state; the provisions of the statute itself; the office of the writ, to furnish to the citizen summary relief where he is unlawfully deprived of his liberty; the failure of the habeas corpus act to provide for any proceedings in error, and the entire inadequacy of such proceedings in many cases; and the prevailing opinion and practice of the courts of the country where the matter is not otherwise regulated by statute,—we think the power and duty of this court and its judges to consider such second applications, and, in proper cases, to issue and have a hearing upon the writ, cannot be seriously questioned.

Moreover, if there should be an exercise of the jurisdiction in any case, it should be in one like this, where the petitioner is imprisoned in execution of a sentence claimed to be illegal because of a denial of a constitutional privilege. Brown on Jurisdiction of Courts, above quoted, further says: "The Constitution of the United States provides . . . that no person shall be subject for the same offense to be put twice in jeopardy of life or limb, nor be compelled to give evidence against himself. Each state Constitution has similar provisions; and, if not, the United States Constitution would be binding on the courts, and a trial by a different method than that prescribed by it would be a nullity, and the judgment void. The refusal of the court to grant each of the rights above enumerated, or all of them, seems to go to the jurisdiction; and, if the court has jurisdiction to try the action, it seems to lose jurisdiction, once acquired, by a disobedience of the mandates of the Constitution; or, rather, the trial ceases to be a legal trial by a deviation from this course. Therefore, when any constitutional right or immunity of a person is violated, the judgment of the court is void. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a recent case, says: 'It 49 L. R. A.

is difficult to see why a conviction and punishment under an unconstitutional law is more violative of a person's constitutional rights than an unconstitutional conviction under a valid law.' [Re Nielsen, 131 U. S. 183, 33 L. ed. 120, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674.] Under this rule, if a court errs in assuming jurisdiction where it does not possess it, or in interpreting a constitutional immunity or right secured thereby against a prisoner, or in refusing him a constitutional right, the jurisdiction over him ceases, and its acts are, not simply erroneous, but void. Therefore it may be laid down as a rule of law that the error of a court in construing any constitutional immunity or right in a criminal case against the accused is as fatal to the judgment as assuming jurisdiction originally where the court had none. Error in either case destroys the power to render any valid judgment, and, if rendered, it is not simply erroneous, but void." Brown, Jurisdiction of Courts, § 97. This statement of the law seems to be applicable equally to a witness imprisoned in denial of his claim of a constitutional right, for he is the defendant in the contempt proceedings. There was formerly much controversy whether, and to what extent, the judgment of a court imprisoning a person for contempt could be collaterally attacked by means of the writ of habeas corpus.

The writ is not in the nature of, nor is it to be used as a substitute for, proceedings in error. A finding or decision of the inferior court, no matter how erroneous, if it does not affect its jurisdiction, is not subject to attack in this collateral proceeding. The office of the writ is to determine the legality of the particular imprisonment, and the facts to be considered in determining that question are jurisdictional facts. If, upon a consideration of such facts, it appears that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in making the order, the petitioner will be discharged upon habeas corpus; and it is not material that the questions might have been brought to this court by petition in error. In Re Boulter this court issued the writ, and carefully considered all the points presented, although, as the court says, "they might all have been raised in proceedings in error, without resorting to habeas corpus." 5 Wyo. 329, 40 Pac. 520. The distinction is tersely stated in Re Nielsen, 131 U. S. 184, 33 L. ed. 120, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674: "The distinction between the case of a mere error in law and of one in which the judgment is void is pointed out in Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 375, 25 L. ed. 717, 718, and is illustrated by the case of Ex parte Parks, 93 U. S. 18, 23 L. ed. 787, as compared with the Cases of Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. ed. 872, and Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 30 L. ed. 558, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556. In the Case of Parks there was an alleged misconstruction of a statute. We held that to be a mere error in law, the court having jurisdiction of the case. In the Cases of Lange and Snow there was a denial of a constitutional right." Our habeas corpus act (Rev. Stat. § 1299) provides: "It is not permissible to question the correctness of the action of a grand jury in finding a bill of indictment, or a petit jury in the trial of a cause, nor a court or judge when acting within their legitimate province, and in a lawful manner." There are similar provisions in the legislation of most of the states. It being a common-law writ, the right to which is secured to us by our Constitution, except when, in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require its suspension, it is not to be supposed that the purpose of the statute was to attempt to detach from its force or curtail its operation, but it is intended as a mere declaration of the common law. It being a constitutional right, the statute would be ineffective, except to declare the law or regulate the method of its enforcement. It was never questioned that the jurisdiction of the committing court over the subject-matter and the person of the applicant might be inquired into in this way; but, under many of the earlier rulings, the power of the court to go beyond this, and inquire into the jurisdiction and power of such court to render the particular judgment, was denied, when the court was shown to have general jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person of the petitioner. But the later decisions seem to take a different view. In Church, Habeas Corpus, § 362, it is said: "The decisions of the courts are not uniform or harmonious on this point, but the later decisions of very high authority go to show that jurisdiction of the person and of the subject-matter are not alone conclusive, but that the jurisdiction of the court to render the particular judgment in question is a proper subject of inquiry." In Brown on Jurisdiction of Courts, before referred to, under the heading "The Three Essential Elements Necessary to Render Conviction Valid," it is said: "These are that the court must have jurisdiction over the subject-matter, the person of the defendant, and authority to render the particular judgment. If either of these elements are lacking, the judgment is fatally defective." Section 110. And it is said in People ex rel. Tweed v. Liscomb: "If a process good in form, issued upon a judgment of a court having jurisdiction, either general or limited, must in all cases be assumed to be valid until the judgment be reversed upon error, the remedy by writ of habeas corpus will be of little value." 60 N. Y. 570, 19 Am. Rep. 211.

Many of the earlier decisions have refused to discharge upon habeas corpus, under the rule that only questions of jurisdiction could be considered, and that, when the committing court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, the judgment was conclusive. Others, while professing to adhere to the same rule, have gone beyond it, and, though the jurisdiction of the committing court over the subject-matter and of the person was admitted, have gone into the question of the power of the committing court, under the facts of the case, to render the particular judgment. Thus it is said in a California case: "Of course, where a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, its judgment is not reversible on such process. Being conclusive, courts will not go behind it, to ascertain whether any errors of law were committed in the proceedings in which it was rendered." After stating the principle thus, the court, however, immediately proceeds to say: "But the judgment is not conclusive upon the question of the authority of the court that rendered it. That, as well as any other matter which would render the proceedings void, is always open to inquiry. It were a legal absurdity to say that a judgment of conviction, valid in form, precluded all inquiry into authority to render it. In Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 212, this court went behind the judgment of the police court of San Francisco, to determine whether the act of which the petitioner in that case was convicted was a criminal offense known to the law, and, having reached the conclusion that it was not, we held the judgment of conviction absolutely void. As was said in that case: 'Whenever a court undertakes to imprison for an offense to which no criminality is attached, it acts beyond its jurisdiction.' Nearly a hundred years ago, the author of Bacon's Abridgment thus expressed the same doctrine: 'If the commitment be against law, as being made by one who had no jurisdiction of the case, or for a matter for which by law no man ought to be punished, the courts are to discharge.'" Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 407. And in that case, it being a commitment for contempt, the court held that the jurisdiction of the court to punish and imprison for such an offense was reviewable by the supreme court on habeas corpus, or on certiorari, and on appeal. It is aptly said in Ex parte Degener, 30 Tex. App. 566, 17 S. W. 1113: "But jurisdiction is of two kinds: first, the power to hear and determine the particular matter, and to render some judgment thereon; and secondly, the power to render the particular judgment which was rendered. The idea of the early courts seems to have been that jurisdiction of courts consists entirely of the former of these powers." In Re Nielsen, 131 U. S. 184, 33 L. ed. 120, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674, it is said: "A party is entitled to a habeas corpus, not merely where the court is without jurisdiction of the cause, but where it has no constitutional authority or power to condemn the prisoner." In a Washington case the prisoner was committed for a failure to pay certain costs, adjudged against him as the prosecuting witness in a criminal prosecution. The supreme court, on original application for habeas corpus, decided that the prisoner was detained for a cause not recognized by the law as ground for the judgment of imprisonment, and therefore not within the possible jurisdiction of any court. In a former case they had held that the courts were precluded from inquiring further when it appeared that the petitioner was committed by a court of general jurisdiction, in pursuance of its final judgment, for a crime triable by such court. Referring to their decision in that case, they say: "As applied to that case, enough was said; but in this one the qualification that the cause was triable by the court must be extended to cover the condition that the court's judgment was one which, under the law, it had jurisdiction to render." And they further say that the petitioner was not estopped to maintain the habeas corpus proceeding by the fact that he might have appealed from the judgment against him. Re Permatick, 3 Wash. 674, 29 Pac. 351. And we think this is the tenor of authority at this time.

The acts constituting the alleged contempt are to be examined, to ascertain whether, in law, they constitute a contempt, and, if they do not, the court was without jurisdiction to imprison, and the petitioner is entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus. In Michigan, under constitutional provisions similar to our own, there was a statute providing that no court or officer, on the return of any habeas corpus or certiorari, should have power to inquire into the justice or propriety of any commitment for a contempt, made by any court or officer according to law, and charged in such commitment as therein provided. In a habeas corpus proceeding the supreme court of that state held that they had authority to inquire into the justice or propriety of proceedings in contempt only so far as to ascertain whether the court or officer had jurisdiction and was proceeding according to law. But they say: "The question of jurisdiction necessarily involves an inquiry whether the conduct alleged was in fact a contempt of the court, and committed under circumstances which authorize the court to proceed to punishment therefor." Re Wood, 82 Mich. 81, 45 N. W. 1115. In a Texas case, where the witness was committed for refusing to answer, it is said: "The legality of the commitment, however, depends upon the power or jurisdiction of the court to ask the question. If the question be 'improper,'—if the court interrogate a witness about a matter over which it has no jurisdiction, and about which it has no right to inquire,—the refusal of the witness to answer the interrogatory is no contempt of court, and any order or decision which punishes the refusal to answer as a contempt is void." Holman v. Austin, 34 Tex. 668. In Ex parte Irvine the petitioners were called as witnesses for the prosecution upon the trial of twelve defendants upon an indictment for a conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States. The petitioners refused to answer certain questions propounded to them, upon the ground that it might tend to incriminate them. The court decided that the answers to the questions could not possibly incriminate them, and, upon their continued refusal, committed them to jail for contempt. Writs of habeas corpus were sued out before the circuit court of the United States, and, in considering the question how far the court might look beyond the commitment and its recitals, into the evidence and circumstances upon which the committing court acted, the court says: 49 L. R. A.

"The duty of this court to examine into and consider the facts upon which the trial court acted in committing the petitioners cannot be doubted. If the petitioners, in their refusal to answer the questions, were within the protection of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution, the power of the court to commit them for their refusal was exceeded, and the invalidity of the commitment may be declared in this collateral inquiry." 74 Fed. Rep. 954. In an Iowa case the petitioner was subpoenaed to come before a justice of the peace to make an affidavit under the provisions of a certain statute. He refused to appear or testify, and was committed by the justice for contempt. On habeas corpus a majority of the court held that he was properly committed, Justice Beck dissenting; but upon the proposition under consideration the court seem to have been substantially in harmony. The majority opinion states it thus: "We cannot, in a habeas corpus proceeding, review the order of imprisonment for contempt, and reverse, unless the act constituting the alleged contempt was such that we can pronounce, as a matter of law, that it was not a contempt. If, for instance, the justice had no authority to subpoena this plaintiff, and was acting without jurisdiction in doing so, then what he did was done merely as an individual, and whatever contempt there was, if it could be called such, not being for judicial authority, would not be such as the law recognizes and punishes." In the dissenting opinion it is thus stated: "Tribunals may decide all questions touching their jurisdiction, but their decisions supporting their jurisdiction are not conclusive; and judgments rendered without jurisdiction may be assailed either directly or collaterally. The decision of a court that an act is a contempt is a decision as to its jurisdiction, and may be questioned in any collateral proceeding. It may, of course, be assailed upon habeas corpus, which is the very proceeding provided by the law whereby the legality of the imprisonment of a citizen may be determined." And the majority of the court, in announcing their decision at the close of their opinion, fully recognize the principle. They say: "Having reached the conclusion that the justice was not without jurisdiction in issuing the subpoena, and that there was a contempt in fact, we think that this disposes of the case." State ex rel. Whitcomb v. Seaton, 61 Iowa, 563, 16 N. W. 736. In a later case under the same statute, the petitioners refused to obey a subpoena, or to testify, and were committed for contempt. By an unanimous court it was decided that the evidence sought was not of a character contemplated by the statute, that the justice was without authority to issue the subpoena, and that the petitioners were illegally committed; and they were discharged. Dudley v. McCord, 65 Iowa, 671, 22 N. W. 920.

The doctrine thus stated—that in commitments for contempt, and in other cases of alleged illegal imprisonment, the court, on habeas corpus, may inquire into the power of the committing court to make the order, by investigating the question whether the facts constitute a contempt, or, in any case, whether the facts confer jurisdiction upon the court to make the particular order, and, if they do not, to discharge—is, as we believe, sustained by the great mass of the later cases, either in express terms or, tacitly, by acting upon it. We cite a few of the great number bearing upon the question: Re Dill, 32 Kan. 668, 49 Am. Rep. 505, 5 Pac. 39; People ex rel. Hackley v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. 75; Ingle v. State, 8 Blackf. 574; Ex parte Senior, 37 Fla. 1, 32 L. R. A. 133, 19 So. 652; Ex parte Gould, 99 Cal. 360, 21 L. R. A. 751, 33 Pac. 1112; Ex parte Rowland, 104 U. When and under what circumstances a witness shall be protected in refusing to answer, upon the ground that his answers may tend to criminate him, has been very often considered, but is necessarily dependent in a great measure upon the facts of each case. The provision of our Constitution is that "no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in any criminal case." § 11, art. 1. It has been held in some cases that the privilege does not apply, except to the defendant in a criminal case, that the term "criminal case" can only mean a prosecution for a criminal offense, and that the prosecution must be against him. This view, after a thorough consideration, was rejected in the leading case of Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195; and we do not understand that it is contended for in this case. "The object was to insure that a person should not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which might tend to show that he himself had committed a crime."

Neither is it necessary, in order to claim the privilege, that the answer, unconnected with other testimony, should be sufficient to convict him of crime. As said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Burr's Trial, 1 Burr, Tr. 244, Fed. Cas. No. 14,692e: "This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible, but a probable, case that a witness, by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact, of itself, might be unavailing; but all other facts, without it, would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his own bosom, he is safe; but, draw it from thence, and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description. What testimony may be possessed, or is obtainable, against any individual, the court can never know. It would seem, then, that the court ought never to compel a witness to give an answer which discloses a fact that would form a necessary and essential part of a crime which is punishable by the laws." It has been held that, where a prosecution for the offense is barred by the statute of limitations, the privilege does not exist. There are also statutes of the United States and many of the states providing that evidence thus elicited shall not be used against the witness in any prosecution against him, or that he shall not be prosecuted for any matter concerning which he may testify. There is no statute of limitations as to crimes in this state, and we have no statute attempting to confer immunity upon a witness in any case; so that we have only the constitutional provision itself to consider, as applied to the facts of the case before us.

It is contended by counsel for respondent, first, that it does not sufficiently appear that an answer to the question would tend to criminate the petitioner; that, quoting from Wharton, Crim. Ev. 9th ed. 466, "there is no answer which a witness could give which might not become part of a supposable concatenation of incidents from which criminality of some kind might not be inferred;" that the witness in this case was simply called upon, by the questions, to state the facts constituting the offense with which the defendant stood charged, and for which he had been arrested at the instance of the witness himself; and that the witness cannot be permitted to be the exclusive judge whether the answer will criminate him, and thus protect a defendant from merited punishment. It is apparent that these considerations are of the utmost weight, as affecting the proper and efficient administration of the criminal law, and it is of primary importance that the rule by which the court is to determine whether the privilege of the witness shall be allowed shall be correctly ascertained. Quoting again from the section of Wharton above referred to: "To protect a witness from answering, it must appear, from the nature of the evidence which the witness is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend that, should he answer, he would be exposed to a criminal prosecution." In Burr's Trial, Judge Marshall, in stating the rule, said: "When a question is propounded, it belongs to the court to consider, and to decide whether any direct answer to it can implicate the witness. If this be decided in the negative then he may answer it without violating the privilege which is secured to him by law. If a direct answer to it may criminate himself, then he must be the sole judge what his answer would be. The court cannot participate with him in this judgment, because they cannot decide on the effect of his answer without knowing what it would be; and a disclosure of that fact to the judges would strip him of the privilege which the law allows, and which he claims. . . . In such a case, the witness must himself judge what his answer will be; and if he say, on oath, that he cannot answer without accusing himself, he cannot be compelled to answer." 1 Burr, Tr. 244, 245, Fed. Cas. No. 14,692e.

It is urged in this case that the witness had already made statements inquired about by the question propounded, and that to rehearse them as formerly stated, which he must do to make a true answer, could not by any possibility incriminate him. But, independently of the considerations to be adverted to more fully hereafter in this opinion that subsequent acts of the witness, such as compounding the felony, might have intervened, changing his attitude in the premises, we think none of the authorities claim any power in the court to determine what the answer shall be. That, from the nature of the case, and of necessity, is in the breast of the witness. The rule above referred to, by which the court must be governed in allowing or denying the privilege, is variously stated, but, we think, with substantial harmony. In Richman v. State, 2 G. Greene, 534, a case relied on by counsel for respondent, the court says: "When it is evident to the mind of the court that the answer cannot accuse the witness, the court should require him to respond to the interrogatory. . . . Therefore, we think, the better and safer rule to be that of compelling a witness to answer when it is apparent to the court that such answer would not interfere with his legal privilege." And Judge Marshall, in Burr's Trial, 1 Burr, Tr. 244, 255, Fed. Cas. No. 14,692e, summarizes the rule thus: "It is the province of the court to judge whether any direct answer to the question which may be proposed will furnish evidence against the witness. If such answer may disclose a fact which forms a necessary and essential link in the chain of testimony which would be sufficient to convict him of any crime, he is not bound to answer it, so as to furnish matter for that conviction. In such a case, the witness must himself judge what his answer will be; and if he say, on oath, that he cannot answer without accusing himself, he cannot be compelled to answer." The rule is more strongly stated by some of the other cases; as, for example, in Re Tappan, 9 How. Pr. 305, the court says: "The witness alone knows the facts, beyond those to be contained in the answer, which may tend to his conviction. The court is not to compel him to tell what those facts are. If, therefore, he says that the answer may tend to convict him, and on that account refuses to answer, and the court can imagine any state of facts under which the answer might lead to such a result, the witness may insist on the protection of the law, and refuse to answer." But we think, upon reason and authority, the more conservative statement of the rule should be adopted, as in Simmons v. Holster, 13 Minn. 249, Gil. 236: "When it reasonably appears that the answer will have a tendency to expose the witness to a penal liability, or to any kind of punishment, or to a criminal charge, 'the authorities,' says Greenleaf, 'are exceedingly clear that the witness is not bound to answer.' 1 Greenl. Ev. § 451." We think the opinion of Judge Taft in Ex parte Irvine, 74 Fed. Rep. 954, 960, states the rule very clearly: "The great weight of authority, as well as a due regard for the right of the community to have the wheels of justice unlogged, as far as may be consistent with the liberty of the individual, leads us to reject the doctrine that a witness may avoid answering any question by the mere statement that the answer would criminate him, however unreasonable such statement may be. The true rule is that it is for the judge before whom the question arises to decide whether an answer to the question put may reasonably have a tendency to criminate the witness, or to furnish proof of a link in the chain of evidence necessary to convict him of a crime. It is impossible to conceive of a question which might not elicit a fact useful as a link in proving some supposable crime against a witness. The mere statement of his name or of his place of residence might identify him as a felon; but it is not enough that the answer to the question may furnish evidence out of the witness's mouth of a fact which, upon some imaginary hypothesis, would be the one link wanting in the chain of proof against him of a crime. It must appear to the court, from the character of the question and the other facts adduced in the case, that there is some tangible and substantial probability that the answer of the witness may help to convict him of a crime."

Keeping in view this rule, and the principle that the court cannot compel the witness to disclose what crime the answer would tend to convict him of, as such disclosure would defeat the very object of the constitutional privilege, we proceed to an examination of such facts as appear upon the question. The charge of obtaining the sum of $1,130 from the plaintiff by false pretenses had been preferred against the defendants at plaintiff's instance. They had been returned from Colorado by a requisition obtained upon his afadavit. At the time set for their preliminary examination the plaintiff failed to appear as a witness. It was again set down, and the plaintiff again failed to appear, although he had been duly subpoenaed. Thereupon an information was filed against the plaintiff, charging him with compounding the felony of which the defendants were accused, and an attachment issued to bring the plaintiff before the justice as a witness in the preliminary examination of the defendants. The statute prohibiting the compounding of a felony provides that "whoever, having knowledge of the actual commission of a crime of the grade of felony, takes any money or property of another, or any gratuity or reward, or any engagement or promise therefor, upon any agreement or understanding, express or implied, to compound or conceal such crime, as to abstain from any prosecution therefor, or to withhold any evidence thereof, or do any act to encourage or procure the absence of witnesses or other testimony on the examination or trial of such charge, is guilty of a felony, and shall be punished," etc.; prescribing imprisonment in the penitentiary. Laws 1890, p. 142. The information, filed by the prosecuting attorney, charging the petitioner with compounding the felony, first sets out the commission of the felony as in the original information, and then proceeds to state that the petitioner "then and there having knowledge of the actual commission of the felony aforesaid by the said Oliver C. Hough, alias Clifford W. Lang, did then and there feloniously take and receive from the said Oliver C. Hough, alias Clifford W. Lang, eleven hundred and thirty dollars, . . . upon the express agreement and understanding then and there to feloniously compound said felony and conceal its commission." It therefore appears that, when the witness was called upon to state from his own knowledge the facts constituting the guilt of the defendant Hough, he was thereby required to testify to the first and essential fact necessary to his own conviction, viz., his "knowledge of the actual commission of the felony aforesaid," and at the same time to supply the proof, and probably the only available proof, of the equally essential fact in the prosecution of himself,—the commission of the original felony. Adopting, then, Wharton's statement of the rule, it appears, from the nature of the evidence which the witness was called upon to give, that there was reasonable ground to apprehend that, should he answer, he would be exposed to a criminal prosecution. It can make no difference that the information against the petitioner had been dismissed. It was made under oath by the proper officer. It is not to be presumed that it was made without some basis of evidence tending to support it, and the dismissal would in no way interfere with a future prosecution. It is also urged that evidence thus extorted could not be subsequently used against the plaintiff in any prosecution against him, and that the petitioner is therefore protected. But the constitutional privilege is that the evidence shall not be extorted. It is not 49 L. R. A.

that such testimony shall not be used against him, nor that he shall not be prosecuted for a crime concerning which he has been required to give testimony tending to incriminate himself, but that he shall not be compelled to testify. The principle that evidence obtained by a violation of this privilege cannot be used against him was never intended to authorize or excuse a violation of such privilege; and, as before remarked, we have no statute which attempts to substitute immunity from the consequences of a violation of the privilege for the privilege itself.

It is insisted that the affidavit made by the plaintiff in the requisition proceedings shows that his refusal to answer and his claim of privilege were not made in good faith. We understand that counsel do not contend that the privilege of the witness was waived by making the statements contained in the affidavit. Indeed, the authorities are clear upon the proposition that previous sworn statements, in or out of court, do not constitute a waiver, and do not deprive the witness of his constitutional privilege, when he thereafter claims it. In Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145, the supreme court of Wisconsin said: "The fact that a witness made previous self-incriminating statements in court on some other trial, or out of court, made no difference. The immunity was complete, unless waived by the witness with knowledge of his rights. That right exists under our system of constitutional guaranty to the fullest extent, and is to be protected as rigidly and fairly as any other constitutional right, and not to be weakened or impaired by inventing new methods or ways of evading it." In a Georgia case it was argued that, as the witness had voluntarily testified at a previous trial as to the very matters concerning which he had at the later trial chosen to remain silent, he had waived his privilege; but the court rejected the proposition, saying: "The fact that Lybrend [the witness] had made the waiver at a former hearing before a different jury, and under circumstances necessarily to a greater or less extent unlike those surrounding the last trial, did not preclude him from exercising his privilege at a later stage of the case. He may, on one occasion, have had reasons for speaking out which were entirely satisfactory to himself; and, on the next, he may have been influenced to keep silent by other reasons, which were, in his opinion, equally cogent. These were matters for himself alone to determine. The privilege is in the highest degree personal, and is a sacred one, which the courts should jealously guard." Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Lybrend, 99 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794. In Temple v. Com. 75 Va. 892, it was held that the fact that the witness testified before the grand jury, and that it was on his testimony that the indictment was found, will not deprive him of his privilege to decline to testify on the trial of the party indicted. See also Cullen v. Com. 24 Gratt. 624, to the same effect. In Illinois a witness who claimed the privilege had instigated the prosecution, and had made a sworn statement upon the back of the information to the effect that the allegations thereof were true; yet his conduct was held not to amount to a waiver of his constitutional privilege when called as a witness upon the trial of the accused. In that case the court said: "The privilege which a witness has of refusing to give evidence which will criminate himself is granted to him upon grounds of public policy, and as one of the safeguards of his personal liberty. It cannot be regarded as released or waived by some disclosure which he may have made elsewhere and under other circumstances. If the answer to a question put to him as a witness upon the stand might tend to criminate him, it would not tend any the less to do so because he had elsewhere made a statement having such a tendency. The question is not as to what he may have previously said in an affidavit, but the question is whether the disclosure he is asked to make as a witness upon the trial of the case will have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge or penalty." And the court added: "We are of the opinion that his constitutional right in this regard is not abridged or waived by the fact of making the ex parte affidavit indorsed upon the information filed by the prosecuting attorney." [Salem v. People, 164 Ill. 379, 45 N. E. 728.]

In this case, however, the crime of compounding a felony, if committed by the witness, must have been committed after the affidavit in the requisition proceedings had been made; and the latter, therefore, can hardly throw much light upon the question of his good faith in declining to testify upon the subsequent trial. There seems, however, to be some misconception regarding the question of good faith. The question is not whether the witness has been in good faith with the prosecution throughout the case. It is, rather, whether his refusal to testify is really and sincerely dictated by a belief that his answers will tend to criminate him. In the case of Ex parte Irvine, 74 Fed. Rep. 954, 960, Judge Taft lays down the rule upon this branch of the case which seems to us to be the correct one. He says: "We do not understand any of the American authorities to go so far as to hold that where, from the evidence and the nature of the question, the court can definitely determine that the question, if answered in a particular way, will form a link in the chain of evidence to establish the commission of a crime by the witness, the court should inquire into the motive of the witness in pleading his privilege. It is only where the criminating effect of the question is doubtful that the motive of the witness may be considered; for in such a case his bad faith would have a tendency to show that his answer would not subject him to the danger of a criminal prosecution, or help to prove him guilty of crime." In the Irvine Case it was argued by counsel that the privilege was pleaded merely to shield the defendants on trial. The court, however, held that the witness was entitled to the privilege insisted on. That case makes the proposition entirely clear that when the court can determine from the circumstances and nature of the question, that the question is incriminating in character, there is, then, no question of good or bad faith to be considered.

It is suggested that to permit a witness to refuse to testify under such circumstances would be to place the administration of the criminal law in the hands of witnesses, often influenced by improper motives; thus making convictions difficult, and often impossible. It is, perhaps, sufficient to say that the principle is not a new one. "It is an ancient principle of the law of evidence that a witness shall not be compelled, in any proceeding, to make disclosures or to give testimony which will tend to criminate him, or subject him to fines, penalties, or forfeitures." Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195; citing a number of English cases. It is said by Starkie to be based upon two grounds,—one of policy, and one of humanity; "of policy, because it would place the witness under the strongest temptation to commit . . . perjury, and of humanity, because it would be to extort a confession of the truth by a kind of duress, every species and degree of which the law abhors." Starkie, Ev. 40, 41. It long antedates our Constitution or the Constitution of the United States. It has been acted upon in the courts of this country and England for a great many years, and no such disastrous consequences in the administration of the criminal law have ensued. In practice it has been found that the privilege is very rarely claimed, and the claim is guarded against abuses as carefully and effectually as the exercise of any other of the unquestioned constitutional rights of the citizen. It must be made under oath, and the penalties of perjury attach as in other cases of false testimony if it is not made in good faith; and the witness is not the final judge whether the privilege exists in the particular case, but the decision is to be made by the court. But that it may be abused is not an argument which this court is at liberty to consider, further than to guard against such abuses as far as consistent with the maintenance of the right itself. It is imbedded in the Constitution, and embodies the wisdom of some centuries of experience upon the subject, and there is no temptation for us to evade or amend it by reason of any considerations of convenience or necessity. The cases of fancied necessity, if there were any relaxation of the principle, would undoubtedly multiply, under the pressure of officers and others naturally and often very properly eager for convictions, much more rapidly than the cases where the privilege is claimed have done, under a full and complete, but just and careful, enforcement of the constitutional right.

We are of the opinion that the imprisonment of the plaintiff is illegal, and that he must be discharged; and it is so ordered.

Potter, Ch. J., concurring:

I concur in the opinion and conclusions of Mr. Justice Corn. I regard as entirely immaterial the question whether the order of a district court refusing to discharge a petitioner upon habeas corpus may be brought to this court for review by petition in error or otherwise. Notwithstanding that such an order might be so reviewable, I entertain no doubt whatever of the original jurisdiction of this court in habeas corpus, even in a case where upon the same facts a previous hearing has been had in the district court, and the petitioner's application denied. That jurisdiction is granted by the Constitution in unmistakable language, and the statute does not in any way attempt to restrict it, but on the contrary, confirms it. Neither in the Constitution nor statutes is the jurisdiction or its exercise made dependent upon the absence of any other remedy. It seems, therefore, unnecessary to consider or decide whether the order of the district court refusing to discharge the petitioner could be brought here by some appellate proceeding. Cases may arise where it would not be deemed expedient for this court to exercise its original jurisdiction, where, upon the same facts and in a similar proceeding, a district court or judge shall have previously denied the relief sought. But, in a case like the one now before us, where the petitioner is imprisoned in execution of a sentence, and that sentence is alleged to be illegal, and especially where such illegality is alleged to consist in the denial of a constitutional guaranty or immunity, I am convinced that it is the duty of the court to exercise its jurisdiction in the premises, and inquire into the legality of the imprisonment, and, if the imprisonment be determined to be illegal, to discharge the petitioner. Otherwise, the writ of habeas corpus would be largely deprived of its most beneficial purposes. Neither do I esteem it material whether the order of the justice committing the petitioner was or is subject to review on appeal or error by a higher tribunal. Where habeas corpus is an appropriate remedy, it matters not that a remedy also existed by writ of error, or by some other appellate proceeding. This principle is well established, and I believe that no authority disputes it. This doctrine is not to be confounded with that other one, well understood and thoroughly established, that habeas corpus does not take the place of a writ of error, and that, in such a proceeding, mere errors of law are not reviewable. To deny our jurisdiction, on the ground that the order of the justice is or was appealable, would also deny the jurisdiction of the district court in the habeas corpus proceeding, which was entertained by that court. I have alluded to the principle that habeas corpus does not usurp the prerogative of a writ of error. The decision of the committing court on questions of law or fact within its jurisdiction is conclusive; and, however erroneous the proceedings may be, they cannot be reviewed collaterally on habeas corpus. It is a fundamental principle that errors and irregularities, not jurisdictional, will not be examined or inquired into on such a writ; but questions affecting the jurisdiction of the court and errors which are jurisdictional may always be examined into on habeas corpus, and this rule is as fundamental as the other.

amined into on habeas corpus, and this rule is as fundamental as the other.

The inquiry in this case, then, is whether the decision of the magistrate, that the petitioner was guilty of a contempt in refusing to answer the questions, amounts, if erroneous, to a mere error of law, or whether a question of jurisdiction is involved in that decision. This matter is fully discussed, and the authorities reviewed, in the opinion of Judge Corn; and all I care to say in respect to it is that, upon reason and authority, if the act of the petitioner in refusing to answer the questions was not a contempt in law, the justice was without jurisdiction to commit him. This proposition is sustained by the great weight of authority, and particularly the modern decisions; and, in my judgment, it rests upon sound reasoning. If the petitioner is protected by a constitutional privilege, as he claims, then he had an absolute right, guaranteed by our Constitution, to refuse an answer, and his act in so refusing was not, in legal contemplation, a contempt. The majority of the court are of the opinion, for the reasons stated by Judge Corn, that he was so protected, and could not lawfully be required to answer the questions. The distinction is clearly laid down in Brown on Jurisdiction of Courts, and that author pertinently states, in substance, that, if a court attempts to deprive a party of a constitutional guaranty or privilege, its jurisdiction is exceeded. It therefore follows that the magistrate was without jurisdiction to commit petitioner, and the order committing him is void; and, where that is the case, under all the authorities, he may be discharged upon habeas corpus. The contempt charged against the petitioner is not that of disorderly conduct, or disobedience of process, nor in refusing to answer without assigning any reason. He claims that he could not do so without incriminating himself, thereby giving a reason which, if made in good faith, and under such circumstances as reasonably to disclose that the answers might tend to incriminate him, entitles him to be excused from answering.

There exists but little disagreement among the courts of this country respecting the general principles which must govern this case. Whatever differences there are grow out of the application of those principles. With most of the decisions cited and quoted from in the dissenting opinion of our brother, Mr. Justice Knight, I have no fault to find or criticisms to make. They are, most of them, at least, in perfect accord with those cited in the majority opinion of the court in this case, and, with a very few exceptions, do not at all conflict with the views entertained and applied by the court in the case at bar. Owing to the importance of the questions involved in this hearing, and the fact that they were matters of first impression in this court, I have thought it advisable to thus briefly state the reasons which have led to my conclusions.

Knight, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the opinion and judgment of this court as announced, for reasons some of which, in view of the learned discussion as submitted, at first glance may appear of little force. Admitting all that is claimed for the writ of habeas corpus,—its antiquity, that it is in the interest of the oppressed, and that it is in many instances beyond legislation, being a part of the constitutional enactments,—still I desire, after making such admission, which is in accordance with the views so ably expressed by my associates, to refer to some of the judges and courts that have pointed out the far-reaching effects of the abuse or misapplication of this writ and of its humane intendments, and illustrating the abuses to which it has been subjected. I am of the opinion that in this case, under the circumstances and upon the showing made, the writ should not have issued that has been made returnable and is being considered here; that, while it is true that the Constitution gives this court and each of its members original jurisdiction in habeas corpus, there is also abundant authority in our statute that confers upon this court power to review on error proceedings in habeas corpus; and that, while the latter authority may not take away the original jurisdiction, still, in the interest of a uniform practice, it should have such a restraining influence as would make this court and its members exercise the original jurisdiction with great care and caution, and never when the object of the writ is to review error of inferior courts. I am of the opinion that, to entitle a person called as a witness to the privilege of silence, the court must see, from all the circumstances of the case, and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called on to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend that the evidence may tend to criminate him if he is compelled to answer, and that a review of a ruling upon this proposition of law should not be by habeas corpus. I am of the opinion that in the case at bar there was not one fact or circumstance surrounding the case, or brought to the attention of the justice acting as a committing magistrate, that would have excused him for giving to the applicant as a witness the exemption claimed; that, if there was cause to excuse the witness from answering, such cause was known only to himself, and could not avail him. I claim that a fair and reasonable interpretation of the act of the prosecuting attorney in making the affidavit charging the applicant with having compounded a felony is that he did it for the reason that he believed the applicant, while a witness, had agreed not to appear and testify, as he was bound to do, and that, when he did appear, there was not probable cause to make such a charge, and he withdrew it before a warrant had been served or issued upon the affidavit, and that the one fact that such an affidavit was made is not sufficient to excuse the witness from answering or refusing to give any reason for such refusal; the exemption being for the witness, and not for his attorneys, to claim. Upon these various propositions of law I offer the following authorities:

this to say of a case in point: "It appears that a petition had been presented to one of the judges of the superior court of King county, and had been refused, whereupon application has been made to this court. While it is true that the Constitution invested the supreme court with original jurisdiction of habeas corpus [art. 4, § 4], it does not follow that it must take original jurisdiction in cases that have been commenced in the superior court, or before a judge thereof. It is true that this is a writ of high personal privilege, and involves personal liberty,—a right which the law most jealously guards; but a citizen's right to liberty is involved in many cases. This question, like all other questions involving his right to liberty, he has a right to have adjudicated by a competent tribunal; and that adjudication, like any other, is presumed to be right until the contrary is made to appear on appeal. It is an adjudication by a competent tribunal—not an adjudication by every competent tribunal—to which the petitioner is entitled. It does not seem to us that it accords with the orderly administration of the law to allow this application to be made to every superior judge and every justice of the supreme court in the state, which would be the practical result, in many instances, of sustaining petitioner's contention. This, we believe, is not the object of the law. The object in giving every judge in the state original jurisdiction, no doubt, was to place the remedy within easy reach of the applicant, and to insure him speedy relief when he was entitled to such, and not to give him a multiplicity of trials. It is true that in some of the states the practice is different, but such practice does not commend itself to our judgment, and we cannot follow it. When one trial has been accorded the petitioner, he has secured all the rights which the law has guaranteed him. The petition will therefore be denied. Re Graham, 7 Wash. 237. 34 Pac. 931.

In Ex parte Kearney, 7 Wheat. 38, 5 L. ed. 391, the syllabus is as follows: This court has no authority to issue a writ of habeas corpus to bring up the body of a person committed to jail for a contempt by the circuit court of the District of Columbia. Jones moved for a habeas corpus "to bring up the body of John T. Kearney, now in jail in the custody of the marshal, under a commitment of the circuit court for the District of Columbia for an alleged contempt. The petition stated that, on the trial of an indictment in that court, the petitioner was examined as a witness, and refused to answer a certain question which was put to him, because he conceived it tended materially to implicate him and criminate him as a particeps criminis. The objection was overruled by the court, and he, having persisted in refusing to answer the question, was committed to jail for the supposed contempt, and for no other cause." Justice Story, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in this case said, among other things: "Upon the argument of this motion, two questions have been made: First, whether this court has authority to issue a habeas corpus where a person is in jail under the warrant or order of any other court of the United States; secondly, if it have, whether, upon the facts stated, a fit case is made out to justify the exercise of such authority. As to the first question, it is unnecessary to say more than the point has already passed in rem judicata in this court. In the case of Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch, 75, 2 L. ed. 554, it was expressly decided, upon full argument, that this court possessed such an authority, and the question has ever since been considered at rest. The second point is of much more importance. It is to be considered that this court has no appellate jurisdiction confided to it in criminal cases by the laws of the United States. It cannot entertain a writ of error to revise the judgment of the circuit court in any case where a party has been convicted of a public offense; and, undoubtedly, the denial of this authority proceeded upon great principles of public policy and convenience. If every party had a right to bring before this court every case in which judgment had been passed against him for a crime or misdemeanor or felony, the course of justice might be materially delayed and obstructed, and in some cases totally frustrated. If, then, this court cannot directly reverse a judgment of the circuit court in a criminal case, what reason is there to suppose that it was intended to vest it with authority to do it indirectly? It is also to be observed that there is no question here but that this commitment was made by a court of competent jurisdiction and in the exercise of an unquestionable authority. The only objection is, not that the court acted beyond its jurisdiction, but that it erred in its judgment of the law applicable to the case. If, then, we are to give any relief in this case, it is by a revision of the opinion of the court, given in the course of a criminal trial, and thus asserting a right to control its proceedings, and take from them the conclusive effect which the law intended to give them. If this were an application for a habeas corpus, after judgment on an indictment for an offense within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, it could hardly be maintained that this court could revise such a judgment, or the proceedings which led to it, or set it aside, and discharge the prisoner. There is, in principle, no distinction between that case and the present; for, when a court commits a party for a contempt, their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment in consequence is execution. And so the law was settled upon full deliberation in the Case of Crosby, 3 Wils. 188." Here follows a discussion of the case referred to, and the justice continues: "So that it is most manifest, from the whole reasoning of the court in this case, that a writ of habeas corpus was not deemed a proper remedy where a party was committed for a contempt by a court of competent jurisdiction, and that, if granted, the court could not inquire into the sufficiency of the cause of commitment. If, therefore, we were to grant the writ in this case, it would be applying it in a manner not 49 L. R. A.

justified by principle or usage, and we should be bound to remand the party, unless we were prepared to abandon the whole doctrine, so reasonable, just, and convenient, which has hitherto regulated this important subject. We are entirely satisfied to administer the law as we find it, and are all of opinion that, upon the facts of this case, the motion ought to be denied. The argument of inconveniences has been pressed upon us with great earnestness; but, where the law is clear, this argument can be of no avail, and it will probably be found that there are also serious inconveniences on the other side. Wherever power is lodged, it may be abused; but this forms no solid objection against its exercise. Confidence must be reposed somewhere; and, if there should be abuse, it will be a public grievance, for which a remedy may be applied by the legislature, and is not to be devised by courts of justice. This argument was also used in the case already cited, and the answer of the court to it is so satisfactory that it would be useless to attempt any further refutation. Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court that the motion be overruled. Writ denied."

Chief Justice Dixon, of the supreme court of Wisconsin, in the case of the petition of Crandall for habeas corpus, says: "It is conceded that for mere error, no matter how flagrant, the remedy is not by a writ of habeas corpus." 34 Wis. 177.

Judge Cooley, in his treatise on Constitutional Limitations, 4th ed., p. 430, says: "In the great anxiety on the part of our legislatures to make the most ample provision for speedy relief from unlawful confinement, authority to issue the writ of habeas corpus has been conferred upon inferior judicial officers, who make use of it sometimes as if it were a writ of error, under which they might correct the errors and irregularities of other judges and courts, whatever their relative jurisdiction and dignity. Any such employment of the writ is an abuse. Where a party who is in confinement under judicial process is brought up on habeas corpus, the court or judge before whom he is returned will inquire: First, whether the court or officer issuing the process under which he is detained had jurisdiction of the case and has acted within that jurisdiction in issuing such process. If so, mere irregularities or errors of judgment in the exercise of that jurisdiction must be disregarded on this writ, and must be corrected either by the court issuing the process or on regular appellate proceedings. Second, if the process is not void for want of jurisdiction, the further inquiry will be made whether, by law, the case is bailable, and, if so, bail will be taken if the party offers it; otherwise he will be remanded to the proper custody."

A case of interest in this discussion, and one that seems to be persuasive, is that of People v. Cassels (in the supreme court of New York) 5 Hill, 164. A statement of the facts is in the words following: "Cassels, the prisoner, was examined on oath (see United States v. Wyngall, 5 Hill, 16), and a witness was examined on his behalf. The testimony tended to establish the following facts: In June, 1842, Cassels was arrested and examined before Justice Briggs on a charge of kidnapping and carrying off one Betsey L. Stafford from the county of Chenango to the city of Troy, Rensselaer county. After having been kept under examination about a week, he was discharged by the justice for the want of evidence. He was then summoned to appear before Justice Edwards as a witness on the 11th of July, and was then sworn and examined, for the purpose, as was said, of eliciting facts upon which a warrant might be issued against one Sally Grant, of the city of Troy, for her alleged agency in procuring the abortion of Betsey L. Stafford at the city of Troy, which was followed by the death of said Betsey. When Cassels was sworn, he was not examined touching the supposed guilt of Sally Grant, but was required to state what he knew about the transportation of Betsey L. Stafford from Chenango to Rensselaer county. When asked the question mentioned in the commitment, he declined answering it, on the ground that it might form a link in a chain of evidence tending to criminate himself. Sally Grant was not before the justice, and it was not alleged that she was in the county of Chenango, or that she had ever committed any crime in that county—the crime imputed to her having been committed in Rensselaer county, where she resided. The judge decided that Justice Edwards acted without authority in the proceeding upon which Cassels was sworn as a witness, for the reason that Sally Grant was neither before the justice nor in the county of Chenango at the time, and it was not alleged or pretended that she had committed any offense in that county, but only in the county of Rensselaer, where she lived; and on that ground an order was made discharging Cassels from imprisonment. The district attorney brought this certiorari to reverse the proceedings before the judge." And Justice Bronson, upon those facts, says: "If the justice had authority to inquire into the alleged offense of Sally Grant, the commitment of Cassels could not be impeached upon habeas corpus for any supposed error of the justice in requiring the witness to answer an improper question. A contempt was specially and plainly charged in the commitment, and it was the duty of the judge forthwith to remand the prisoner. 2 Rev. Stat. p. 567, § 40. The statute expressly forbids an inquiry into the justice or propriety of the commitment in such a case. Id. § 42. If there had been no such statute, it is clear, upon principle, that the judgment or decision of any court or officer of competent jurisdiction cannot be reviewed on habeas corpus. If there has been error the remedy is by certiorari or writ of error. When the return states the imprisonment to be by virtue of legal process, the officer may inquire whether in truth there be any process, and whether it appears upon its face to be valid; and he may also inquire whether any cause has arisen since the commitment for putting an end to the imprisonment,—as a pardon, reversal of the judgment, payment of the fine, and the like. But he cannot rejudge the judgment of the committing court or magistrate. Re Clark, 9 Wend. 220; People v. McLeod, 1 Hill, 404, 37 Am. Dec. 328; Middlesex Sheriff, 11 Ad. & El. 273; People v. McLeod, 3 Hill, 658, notes 30, 31. The principal, if not the only, object of the 48th section of the habeas corpus act, was to provide for cases where the party is restrained of his liberty without the authority of legal process. In such cases, the return is usually made by a person having an interest in the question, and who has exercised the restraint upon his own responsibility,—as the parent, husband, master, or guardian of the person imprisoned: and it is very proper that the facts which they state in the return should be open to investigation. See 3 Hill. 660, note, and the cases there cited. But it is otherwise when the return is made by an officer having legal process. It is evident from the 40th section of the statute that the legislature did not intend to provide for a retrial by habeas corpus in such a case. The review is by certiorari or writ of error. It is quite clear, therefore, that the judge had no authority to inquire into the truth of the fact adjudged by the committing magistrate, to wit, that the prisoner was in contempt for not answering a question put to him when giving his evidence; nor could he inquire whether the question was a proper one, or whether the prisoner was privileged from answering it. But the prisoner had an undoubted right to show that the committing magistrate acted without authority; and this is so, notwithstanding the commitment recite the existence of the necessary facts to give jurisdiction. No court or officer can acquire jurisdiction by the mere assertion of it, or by falsely alleging the existence of facts on which jurisdiction depends. Now, it turns out, as the judge has found the facts, that this supposed contempt did not happen, as the commitment states 'on the trial of a cause' before the justice, nor 'upon the examination of one Sally Grant on a criminal complaint.' Sally Grant was never brought before the justice. She was not in the county of Chenango, nor was it pretended that she had ever committed any offense in that county. The crime which they were attempting to fasten upon her was committed in the county of Rensselaer, where she lived. A justice of the peace is for some purposes a town officer, and for other purposes a county officer. He may issue process for the arrest of offenders where the crime was committed in his county, although the criminal may have escaped in another county (2 Rev. Stat. p. 706, §§ 1-5); and, possibly, he may issue process when the offender is in his county, although the crime was committed elsewhere. We are, however, inclined to a different opinion. But it is not now necessary to settle that question. Here neither the crime nor the offender was in Chenango, and the justice was without the shadow of authority in attempting to inquire into the matter. The whole proceeding was coram non judice. Indeed, it wears the appearance of an attempt to pervert justice, by getting up a sham complaint against Sally Grant for the purpose of compelling Cassels to criminate himself, after a failure to find evidence to sustain the charge which had previously been made against him. But I ought to mention that the justice has not been heard upon this matter; and, as there are usually two sides to every case, it is not improbable that the facts may hereafter assume a different appearance."

The supreme court of California, in the case of Ex parte McCullough, 35 Cal. 98, says: "Habeas corpus is undoubtedly the proper remedy for every unlawful imprisonment, both in civil and criminal cases; but an imprisonment is not unlawful, in the sense of this rule, merely because the process or order under which the party is held has been irregularly issued, or is erroneous. Process which has been irregularly issued may be set aside by the court or officer by whom it was issued, and erroneous judgments or orders may be reversed on appeal or writ of error. The writ of habeas corpus has not been given for the purpose of reviewing judgments or orders made by a court or judge or officer acting within their jurisdiction. To put it to such a use would be to convert it into a writ of error, and confer upon every officer who has authority to issue the writ appellate jurisdiction over the orders and judgments of the highest judicial tribunals in the land. County judges, though occupying an inferior position, and exercising an inferior jurisdiction, would be by such a rule empowered to review and practically reverse the judgments and orders of the district courts, and of the supreme court itself, and also of the Federal courts exercising jurisdiction within the state. Establish the doctrine that the judgments and orders of courts may be reviewed on habeas corpus, upon the ground of error, and appeals for the correction of errors may be dispensed with in all cases in which the arrest or imprisonment of persons is allowed. Every criminal action, every civil action in which an arrest is given, and every proceeding for a contempt, could be brought to the supreme court by writ of habeas corpus. Not only that, but, as already suggested, inferior tribunals would be called upon to review the judgments of superior tribunals, and tribunals of equal grade to interfere and review each other's proceedings. Such a rule would render all judicial proceedings amorphous, and lead to the utmost confusion and disorder. It is well settled that habeas corpus can be put to no such use, and that its functions, where the party who has appealed to its aid is in custody under process, do not extend beyond an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court by which it was issued, and the validity of the process upon its face. People v. Cassels, 5 Hill, 167; People ex rel. Mitchell v. New York Sheriff, 7 Abb. Pr. 96; Ex parte Gibson, 31 Cal. 619."

Chief Justice Cole, in the case of State ex rel. McCaslin v. Smith, 65 Wis. 93, 26 N. W. 258, has this to say: "But a complaining witness, who instigates a criminal prosecution maliciously and without probable cause, 49 L. R. A.

in a sense makes himself party to it. His position is similar to that of a party who signs as surety an undertaking for the return of property replevied. Such a surety becomes a quasi party to the suit, and is liable to have judgment entered against him, with his principal, on the failure of the latter to maintain his cause. Pratt v. Donovan, 10 Wis. 378. We must assume that the defendant in error instituted the criminal prosecution in his own wrong, to harass and oppress an innocent party. There is no hardship in holding that by so doing he submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the examining magistrate."

The supreme court of Massachusetts, in Whitcomb's Case, 120 Mass. 118, 21 Am. Rep. 502, announces the following doctrine: "Justices of the peace are recognized in the Constitution of the commonwealth as exercising a part of the judiciary power, and are for some purposes courts of record. Mass. Const. chap. 3, art. 3; Thayer v. Com. 12 Met. 9. Their authority to punish for contempts, at least so far as is indispensable to the orderly conducting of their business, and especially in the case of the refusal of witnesses, after due summons and payment of their fees, to appear and testify before them, has been generally admitted, and has been regulated by statute from the earliest time of the commonwealth. Stat. 1784, chap. 28, § 6; Rev. Stat. chap. 85, § 33, and commissioner's note to § 31; Stat. 1838, chap. 42; Gen. Stat. chap. 120, § 50; chap. 131, §§ 5, 6; Clarke's Case, 12 Cush. 320; Piper v. Pearson, 2 Gray, 120, 61 Am. Dec. 438; State v. Copp, 15 N. H. 212; Re Cooper, 32 Vt. 253."

The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the Case of Williamson, 26 Pa. 9, 67 Am. Dec. 374, has passed upon several questions here involved. Mr. Justice Black says, at different times, as follows: "This is an application by Passmore Williamson for a writ of habeas corpus. He complains that he is held in custody under a commitment of the district court of the United States for a contempt of that court in refusing to obey its process. The process for which he is confined for disobeying was a habeas corpus, commanding him to produce the bodies of certain colored persons claimed as slaves under the law of Virginia. Is he entitled to the writ he has asked for? In considering what answer we shall give to this question, we are, of course expected to be influenced, as in other cases, by the law and the Constitution alone. The gentlemen who appeared as counsel for the petitioner, and who argued the motion in a manner which did them great honor, pressed upon us no considerations except those which were founded upon their legal views of the subject. It is argued with much earnestness, and no doubt with perfect sincerity, that we are bound to allow the writ, without stopping to consider whether the petitioner has or has not laid before us any probable cause for supposing that he is illegally detained; that every man confined in prison, except for treason or felony, is entitled to it, ex debito justitiæ; and that we cannot refuse it without a frightful violation of the petitioner's rights, no matter how plainly it may appear on his own showing that he is held in custody for a just cause. If this be true, the case of Ex parte Lawrence, 5 Binn. 304, is not law. There the writ was refused because the applicant had been previously heard before another court; but if every man who applies for a habeas corpus must have it as a matter of right, and without regard to anything but the mere fact that he demands it, then a court or a judge has no more power to refuse a second than a first application. Is it really true that the special application which must be made for every writ of habeas corpus, and the examination of the commitment, which we are bound to make before it can issue, are mere hollow and unsubstantial forms? Can it be possible that the law and the courts are so completely under the control of their natural enemies that every class of offenders against the Union or the state, except traitors and felons, may be brought before us as often as they please, though we know beforehand, by their own admissions, that we cannot help but remand them immediately? If these questions must be answered in the affirmative, then we are compelled, against our will and contrary to our convictions of duty, to wage a constant warfare against the Federal tribunals, by firing off writs of habeas corpus upon them all the time. The punitive justice of the state would suffer still more seriously. The half of the Western Penitentiary would be before us at Philadelphia, and a similar proportion from Cherry Hill and Moyamensing would attend our sittings at Pittsburgh. To remand them would do very little good, for a new set of writs would bring them all back again. A sentence to solitary confinement would be a sentence that the convict should travel for a limited term up and down the state in company with the officers who might have him in charge. By the same means the inmates of the lunatic asylums might be temporarily enlarged, much to their own detriment, and every soldier or seaman in the service of the country could compel their commanders to bring them before the court six times a week. But the habeas corpus act has never received such a construction. It is a writ of right, and may not be refused to one who shows a prima facie case entitling him to be discharged or bailed; but he has no right to demand it who admits that he is in legal custody for an offense not bailable, and he does make what is equivalent to such an admission when his own application, and the commitment referred to in it, show that he is lawfully detained. A complaint must be made, and the cause of detainer submitted to a judge, before the writ can go. The very object and purpose of this is to prevent it from being trifled with by those who have manifestly no right to be set at liberty. It is like a writ of error in a criminal case, which the court or judge is bound to allow if there be reason to suppose that an error has been committed, and equally bound to refuse if it be clear that the judgment must be affirmed. We are not aware that any application to this court for a writ of habeas corpus has ever been successful where the judges, at the time of the allowance, were satisfied that the prisoner must be remanded. The petitioner's counsel say there is but one reported case in which it was refused, and this fact is given in the argument as a reason for supposing that in all other cases the writ was issued without examination. But no such inference can fairly be drawn from the scarcity of judicial decisions on a point like this. We do not expect to find, in reports so recent as ours, those long-established rules of law which the student learns from his elementary books, and which are constantly acted upon without being disputed. The habeas corpus is a common-law writ, and has been used in England from time immemorial, just as it is now. The statute of 31 Car. II. chap. 2. made no alteration in the practice of the courts in granting these writs. 3 Barn. & Ald. 420-422; Chitty, 207. It is merely provided that the judges in vacation should have the power which the courts had previously exercised in term time (1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 586), and inflicted penalties upon those who should defeat its operation. The common law upon this subject was brought to America by the colonists; and most, if not all, the states have since enacted laws resembling the English statute of Charles II. in every principal feature. The Constitution of the United States [art. 1, § 9] declares that 'the privilege of a writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.' Congress has conferred upon the Federal judges the power to issue such writs according to the principles and rules regulating it in other courts. Seeing that the same general principles of common law on this subject prevail in England and America, and seeing, also, the similarity of their statutory regulations in both countries, the decisions of the English judges, as well as of the American courts, both state and Federal, are entitled to our fullest respect as settling and defining our powers and duties. Blackstone (3 Bl. Com. 132) says that the writ of habeas corpus should be allowed only when the court or judge is satisfied that the party hath probable cause to be delivered. He gives cogent reasons why it should not be allowed in any other case, and cites with unqualified approbation the precedent set by Sir Edward Coke and Chief Justice Vaughan in cases where they had refused it. Chitty lays down the same rule. 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 101: 1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 686, 687. It seems to have been acted upon by all the judges. The writ was refused in Rea v. Schiever, 2 Burr. 765, and in the case of Three Spanish Sailors, 2 W. Bl. 1324. In Hobhouse's Case, 3 Barn. & Ald. 420, it was fully settled by a unanimous court as the true construction of the statute that the writ is never to be allowed if, upon view of the commitment, it be manifest that the prisoner must be remanded. In New York, when the statute in force there was precisely like ours (so far, I mean, as this question is concerned), it was decided by the supreme court (Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 282) that the allowance of the writ was a matter within the discretion of the court, depending on the grounds laid in the application. It was refused in Husted's Case, 1 Johns. Cas. 136, and in Re Ferguson, 9 Johns. 239. In addition to this, we have the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in Watkins' Case, 3 Pet. 202, 7 L. ed. 653, that the writ ought not to be awarded if the court is satisfied that the prisoner must be remanded. It was accordingly refused by the Supreme Court of the United States in that case, as it had been before in Kearney's Case. "On the whole, we are thoroughly satisfied that our duty requires us to view and examine the cause of detainer now, and to make an end of the business at once, if it appears that we have no power to discharge him on the return of the writ. The prisoner, as already said, is confined on a sentence of the district court of the United States for a contempt. A habeas corpus is not a writ of error. It cannot bring a case before us in such a manner that we can exercise any kind of appellate jurisdiction in it. On a habeas corpus, the judgment even of a subordinate state court cannot be disregarded, reversed, or set aside, however clearly we may perceive it to be erroneous, and however plain it may be that we ought to reverse it if it were before us on appeal or writ of error. We can only look at the record to see whether a judgment exists, and have no power to say whether it is right or wrong. It is conclusively presumed to be right until it is regularly brought up for revision. We decided this three years ago, at Sunbury, in a case which we all thought one of much hardship. But the rule is so familiar, so universally acknowledged, and so reasonable in itself that it requires only to be stated. It applies with still greater force, or, at least, for much stronger reasons, to the decisions of the Federal courts. Over them we have no control at all, under any circumstances, or by any process that could be devised. Those tribunals belong to a different judicial system from ours. They administer a different code of laws, and are responsible to a different sovereignty. The district court of the United States is as independent of us as we are of it,—as independent as the Supreme Court of the United States is of either. What the law and the Constitution have forbidden us to do directly on writ of error, we, of course, cannot do indirectly by habeas corpus. But the petitioner's counsel have put his case on the ground that the whole proceeding against him in the district court was coram non iudice, null, and void. It is certainly true that a void judgment may be regarded as no judgment at all, and every judgment is void which clearly appears on its own face to have been pronounced by a court having no jurisdiction or authority in the subject-matter; for instance, if a Federal court should convict and sentence a citizen for libel, or if a state court, having no jurisdiction except in civil pleas, should try an indictment for a crime, and convict the party,—in these cases the judgments would be wholly void. If the petitioner can bring himself within this principle, then there is no judgment against him, he is wrongfully imprisoned, and we must order him to be brought out and discharged. What is he detained for? The answer is easy and simple. The commitment shows that he was tried, found guilty, and sentenced for contempt of court, and nothing else. He is now confined in execution of that sentence, and for no other cause. This was a distinct and substantive offense against the authority and government of the United States. Does anybody doubt the jurisdiction of the district court to punish contempt? Certainly not. All courts have this power, and must necessarily have it; otherwise, they could not protect themselves from insult, or enforce obedience to their process. Without it, they would be utterly powerless. The authority to deal with an offender of this class belongs exclusively to the court in which the offense is committed; and no other court, not even the highest, can interfere with its exercise, either by writ of error, mandamus, or habeas corpus. If the power be abused, there is no remedy but impeachment. The law was so held by this court in M'Laughlin's Case, 5 Watts & S. 276, and by the Supreme Court of the United States in Kearney's Case, 7 Wheat. 38, 5 L. ed. 391. It was solemnly settled, as part of the common law, in Crosby's Case, 3 Wils. 188, by a court in which sat two of the foremost jurists that England ever produced. We have not the smallest doubt that it is the law, and we must administer it as we find it. The only attempt ever made to disregard it was by a New York judge (Yates' Case, 4 Johns. 345), who was not supported by his brethren. This attempt was followed by all the evil and confusion which Blackstone and Kent and Story declared to be its necessary consequences. Whoever will trace that singular controversy to its termination will see that the chancellor and a majority of the supreme court, though once outvoted in the senate, were never answered. The senate itself yielded to the force of the truths which the supreme court had laid down so clearly, and the judgment of the court of errors in Yates's Case, 6 Johns. 503, was overruled by the same court the year afterwards in Yates v. Lansing, 9 Johns. 423, 6 Am. Dec. 290, which grew out of the very same transaction and depended on the same principles. Still further reflection at a later period induced the senate to join the popular branch of the legislature in passing a statute which effectually prevents one judge from interfering by a habeas corpus with the judgment of another on a question of contempt. These principles being settled, it follows irresistibly that the district court of the United States had power and jurisdiction to decide what acts constitute a contempt against it, to determine whether the petitioner had been guilty of contempt, and to inflict upon him the punishment which, in its opinion, he ought to suffer. If we fully believed the petitioner to be innocent,—if we were sure that the court which convicted him misunderstood the facts or misapplied

the law,—still we could not re-examine the evidence, or rejudge the justice of the case, without grossly disregarding what we know to be the law of the land. The judge of the district court decided the question on his own constitutional responsibility. Even if he could be shown to have acted tyrannically or corruptly, he could be called to answer for it only in the senate of the United States. "But the counsel of the petitioner go behind the proceedings in which he was convicted, and argue that the sentence for contempt is void, because the court had no jurisdiction of a certain other matter which it was investigating, or attempting to investigate, when the contempt was committed. We find a judgment against him in one case; and he complains about another, in which there is no judgment. He is suffering for an offense against the United States, and he says he is innocent of any wrong to a particular individual. He is conclusively adjudged guilty of contempt; and he tells us that the court has no jurisdiction to restore Mr. Wheeler's slaves. It must be remembered that contempt of court is a specific criminal offense. It is punished sometimes by indictment, and sometimes in a summary proceeding, as it was in this case. In either mode of trial, the adjudication against the offender is a conviction, and the commitment in consequence is execution. 7 Wheat. 38, 5 L. ed. 391. This is well settled, and, I believe, has never been doubted. Certainly the learned counsel for the petitioner have not denied it. The contempt may be connected with some particular cause, or it may consist in misbehavior which has a tendency to obstruct the administration of justice generally. When it is committed in a pending cause, the proceeding to punish it is a proceeding by itself. It is not entitled in the cause pending, but on the criminal side [United States v. Wayne], Wall. C. C. 134, Fed. Cas. No. 16,654. The record of a conviction for contempt is as distinct from the matter under investigation when it was committed as an indictment for perjury is from the cause in which the false oath was taken. Can a person, convicted of perjury, ask us to deliver him from the penitentiary on showing that the oath on which the perjury is assigned was taken in a cause of which the court had no jurisdiction? Would any judge in the commonwealth listen to such a reason for treating the sentence as void? If, instead of swearing falsely, he refuses to be sworn at all, and he is convicted, not of perjury, but of contempt, the same rule applies, and with a force precisely equal. If it be really true that no contempt can be committed against a court while it is inquiring into a matter beyond its jurisdiction, and if the fact was so in this case, then the petitioner had a good defense, and he ought to have made it on his trial. To make it after conviction is too late. To make it here is to produce it before the wrong tribunal. . . . Every judgment must be conclusive until reversed. Such is the character, nature, and essence of all judgments. If it be not conclusive, it is not a judgment. A court must either have power to settle a given question finally and forever, so as to preclude any further inquiry upon it, or else it has no power to make any decision at all. To say that a court may determine a matter, and that another court may regard the same matter afterwards as open and undetermined, is an absurdity in terms. . . . It is most especially necessary that convictions for contempt in one court should be final, conclusive, and free from re-examination by other courts on habeas corpus. If the law were not so, our judicial system would break to pieces in a month. Courts totally unconnected with each other would be coming in constant collision. The inferior courts would revise all the decisions of the judges placed over and above them. A party unwilling to be tried in this court need only defy our authority, and, if we commit him, to take out his habeas corpus before an inferior judge of his own choosing, and, if that judge is of opinion that we ought not to try him, there is an end of the case. This doctrine is so plainly against the reason of the thing that it would be wonderful, indeed, if any authority for it could be found in the books. There is none, except the overruled decision of Mr. Justice Spencer of New York, already referred to, and some efforts of the same kind to control the other courts, made by Sir Edward Coke, in the King's bench, which are now universally admitted to have been illegal, as well as rude and intemperate. On the other hand, we have all the English judges, and all our own, declaring their want of power to interfere with or control one another in this way. I will content myself by simply referring to some of the books in which it is established that the conviction of contempt is a separate proceeding, and is conclusive of every fact which might have been urged on the trial for contempt, and, among others, want of jurisdiction to try the cause in which the contempt was committed: 4 Johns. 325 et seq.; the opinion of Chief Justice Kent on pages 370 to 375; 6 Johns. 503; 9 Johns. 423, 6 Am. Dec. 290; People ex rel. Johnson, v. Nevins, 1 Hill. 170; State v. Woodfin, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 199, 42 Am. Dec. 161; Ex parte Summers, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 153; Re Smethurst, 2 Sandf. 724; Lockwood v. State, 1 Ind. 161; State ex rel. Leavenworth v. Tipton, 1 Blackf. 166; State v. Johnson, 25 Miss. 836; Com. v. Deacon, 2 Wheeler, C. C. 1; 14 Q. B. 558. These cases will speak for themselves, but I may remark, as to the last one, that the very same objection was made there and here. The party was convicted of contempt in not obeying a decree. He claimed his discharge on habeas corpus because the chancellor had no jurisdiction to make the decree, being interested in the cause himself. But the court of Queen's bench held that, if that was a defense, it should have been made on the trial for contempt, and the conviction was conclusive. We cannot choose but hold the same rule here. Any other would be a violation of the law, which is established and sustained by all authority and all reason. But certainly the want of jurisdiction alleged in this case would not even have been a defense on the trial. The proposition that a court is powerless to punish for disorderly conduct or disobedience of its process, in a case which it ought ultimately to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, is not only unsupported by judicial authority, but we think it is new, even as an argument at the bar. We ourselves have heard many cases through and through before we became convinced that it was our duty to remit the parties to another tribunal; but we never thought that our process could be defied in such cases more than in others. There are some proceedings in which the want of jurisdiction would be seen at the first blush, but there are others in which the court must inquire into all the facts before it can possibly know whether it has jurisdiction or not. Anyone who obstructs or baffles a judicial investigation for that purpose is unquestionably guilty of a crime, for which he may and ought to be tried, convicted, and punished. Suppose a local action to be brought in the wrong county; this is a defense to the action, but a defense which must be made out like any other. While it is pending, neither a party, nor an officer, nor any other person can safely insult the court or resist its order. The court may not have had power to decide upon the merits of the case, but it has undoubted power to try whether the wrong was done within its jurisdiction or not. Suppose Mr. Williamson to be called before the circuit court of the United States as a witness in a trial for murder, alleged to be committed on the high seas; can he refuse to be sworn, and at his trial for contempt justify himself on the ground that the murder was in fact committed within the limits of a state, and therefore triable only in a state court? If he can, he can justify perjury for the same reason. But such a defense for either crime has never been heard of since the beginning of the world. Much less can it be shown, after conviction, as a ground for declaring the sentence void."

Mr. Justice Lowrie, in the same case and in a separate opinion, makes use of the following language: "I have not been able to doubt that this court is in many cases bound to exercise its judgment as to the propriety of granting the writ before allowing it to issue. Notwithstanding the words of the act which imposes a penalty for refusing the writ, we are not forbidden to interpret the law. And the necessity of presenting a petition to the court or to a judge thereof; of stating therein whether the prisoner was detained on criminal or on civil process, or neither; of producing the warrant of committal, or accounting for not doing so; the fact that traitors and murderers and fugitives from the justice of other states are excluded from the benefit of the act, and that the writ was not intended for the relief of convict criminals (Cro. Car. 168; 1 Salk. 348), and was not extended to them by our act,—all these matters show plainly enough that the judge or court is not exercising a mere ministerial function in granting the writ. On any other supposition, there is no reason at all for applying to the court, for the prothonotary could grant it as well. And no one can examine the provisions of Magna Charta, the petition of right (3 Car. I.) the statute repealing the star chamber court (16 Car. I. chap. 10), the habeas corpus act of 31 Car. I. and ours of 1785, and the numerous kindred statutes to which that investigation will lead him, without perceiving that a free and open court, and a full and open trial before the superior judges by due course of law, have always been regarded as the best guaranty of the liberty of the citizen. He will see, moreover, very plainly, that the habeas corpus is only a means by which this end is to be secured, so that no ignorance or tyranny of King, or King's counsel, or minister, or of mere local and inferior courts, dependent on and governed by local customs, or of justices of the peace, shall imprison a man without a chance of bail, or a hope of obtaining a speedy trial by the law of the land. See Com. ex rel. Jack v. The Sheriff, 7 Watts & S. 108."

The above cases cannot here be disposed of on the ground that "this was not a case where the applicant was imprisoned, but involved the question of the right to his freedom of one held as a slave," because the former (Williamson Case) surely undertakes the discussion of habeas corpus fully, and cites with approval the latter case (Ex parte Lawrence, 5 Binn. 304).

The case of Ex parte Lawrence, 5 Binn. 304, referred to in the foregoing opinion of Justice Black, is as follows: "Phillips, on behalf of Ann Lawrence, petitioned the court for a habeas corpus under the act of 1785 to one Joseph Vogdes, to bring up the body of Adam Lawrence, then in his custody as a slave, whereas, according to the suggestion, he was free. It was stated by the counsel that the case had been already heard upon a habeas corpus by the common pleas of Philadelphia county, who remanded the prisoner; and that there was no new evidence to lay before this court.

"Per Curiam. We do not think that the act of assembly obliges this court to grant a habeas corpus where the case has been already heard upon the same evidence by another court; and we do not think it expedient in this case, because it has been already heard upon the same evidence, and the party is not without remedy, as he may resort to a homine replegiando. The court are not, however, to be understood as saying that they have not authority to issue a habeas corpus in such a case, if they should think it expedient. Habeas corpus refused."

An interesting case, and one that directly passes upon many of the questions here involved, is the recent one of Brown v. Walker (1896) 161 U. S. 591, 40 L. ed. 819, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 369, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644, and I quote from the language of Mr. Justice Brown, of the United States Supreme Court, in that case: "This case involves an alleged incompatibility between that clause of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution which declares that no person 'shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself' and act of Congress Feb. 11, 1893, chap. 83, 27 Stat. at L. 443, which enacts that 'no person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents before the interstate commerce commission, or in obedience to the subpoena of the commission, . . . on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him, may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said commission, or in obedience to its subpoena or the subpoena of either of them, or in any such case or proceeding.' The act is supposed to have been passed in view of the opinion of this court in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195, to the effect that § 860 of the Revised Statutes, providing no evidence given by a witness shall be used against him, his property or estate, in any manner, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, did not afford that complete protection to the witness which the amendment was intended to guarantee." After giving the gist of the Counselman decision, and referring to statutes giving immunity from prosecution, the court says: "In the latter case [Queen v. Boyes, 1 Best & S. 311, 321] it was suggested, in answer to the production by the solicitor general of a pardon of the witness under the great seal, that by statute no such pardon under the great seal was pleadable to an impeachment by the commons in Parliament; and it was insisted that this was a sufficient reason for holding that the privilege of the witness still existed, upon the ground that, although protected by the pardon against every other form of prosecution, the witness might possibly be subjected to parliamentary impeachment. It was also contended in that case, as it is in the one under consideration, 'that a bare possibility of legal peril was sufficient to entitle a witness to protection; nay, further, that the witness was the sole judge as to whether his evidence would bring him into the danger of the law, and that the statement of his belief to that effect, if not manifestly made, mala fide, would be received as conclusive.' It was held, however, by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, that 'to entitle a party called as a witness to the privilege of silence the court must see, from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer,' although, 'if the fact of the witness being in danger be once made to appear, great latitude should be allowed to him in judging for himself of the effect of any particular question.' 'Further than this,' said the chief justice, 'we are of the opinion that the danger to be apprehended must be real and appreciable, with reference to the ordinary operation of law, in the ordinary course of things,—not a danger of an imaginary and unsubstantial character, having reference to some extraordinary and barely possible contingency, so improbable that no reasonable man would suffer it to influence his conduct. We think that a merely remote and naked possibility, out of the ordinary course of the law, and such as no reasonable man would be affected by, should not be suffered to obstruct the administration of justice. The object of the law is to afford to a party, called upon to give evidence in a proceeding inter alios, protection against being brought by means of his own evidence within the penalties of the law. But it would be to convert a salutary protection into a means of abuse if it were to be held that a mere imaginary possibility of danger, however remote and improbable, was sufficient to justify the withholding of evidence essential to the ends of justice.' . . . All of the cases above cited proceed upon the idea that the prohibition against his being compelled to testify against himself presupposes a legal detriment to the witness arising from the exposure. As the object of the first eight amendments to the Constitution was to incorporate into the fundamental law of the land certain principles of natural justice which had become permanently fixed in the jurisprudence of the mother country, the construction given to those principles by the English courts is cogent evidence of what they were designed to secure, and of the limitations that should be put upon them. This is but another application of the familiar rule that where one state adopts the laws of another, it is also presumed to adopt the known and settled construction of those laws by the courts of the state from which they were taken,"—citing authorities. "The danger of extending the principle announced in Counselman v. Hitchcock is that the privilege may be put forward for a sentimental reason, or for a purely fanciful protection of the witness against an imaginary danger. and for the real purpose of securing immunity to some third person, who is interested in concealing the facts to which he would testify. Every good citizen is bound to aid in the enforcement of the law, and has no right to permit himself, under the pretext of shielding his own good name, to be made the tool of others who are desirous of seeking shelter behind his privilege." Then follows, in the opinion of the court, a discussion of the immunity afforded by the act first described, and this language is used: "It is entirely true that the statute does not purport, nor is it possible for any statute, to shield the witness from the personal disgrace or opprobrium attaching to the exposure of his crime; but, as we have already observed, the authorities are numerous and very nearly uniform to the effect that, if the proposed testimony is material to the issue on trial, the fact that the testimony may tend to degrade the witness in public estimation does not exempt him from the duty of disclosure. A person who commits a criminal act is bound to contemplate the consequences of exposure to his good name and reputation, and ought not to call upon the courts to protect that which he has himself esteemed to be of such little value. The safety and welfare of an entire community should not be put into the scale against the reputation of a self-confessed criminal, who ought not, either in justice or in good morals, to refuse to disclose that which may be of great public utility, in order that his neighbors may think well of him. The design of the constitutional privilege is, not to aid the witness in vindicating his character, but to protect him against being compelled to furnish evidence to convict him of a criminal charge."

In all fairness it should be conceded that this judgment of the highest court in our land was by a divided court. Four of the justices dissent, and in two separate opinions virtually adhere to the opinion rendered in the Counselman Case. Mr. Justice Field, in his separate dissenting opinion, concedes all that is necessary for my contention in this case, as I shall show hereafter, by the following language: "It is conceded as an established doctrine, universally assented to, that a witness claiming his constitutional privilege cannot be questioned concerning the way in which he fears he may incriminate himself, or, at least, only so far as may be needed to satisfy the court that he is making his claim in good faith, and not as a pretext. Fisher v. Ronalds, 12 C. B. 762; Adams v. Lloyd, 3 Hurlst. & N. 351; Reg. v. Boyes, 7 Jur. N. S. 1158; Ex parte Reynolds, 22 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 21, note p. 28; Temple v. Com. (Va.) 2 Crim. L. Mag. & Rep. 645, note 654. To establish such good faith on the part of the witness in claiming his constitutional privilege of exemption from self-incrimination, where he is examined as a witness in a criminal case, he may be questioned as to his apprehension of criminating himself by his answer, but no further."

A leading case, and one that has come down to us as sound doctrine, and runs through a great many, if not all, of the cases since, where the question involved is whether it is for the witness or the court to say that the answer to the question propounded might, could, or would incriminate the witness, from the facts made to appear, is the case known as the Burr Case, where Chief Justice Marshall, after two days' argument upon the one proposition, announced his now famous opinion; and, while ninety-two years have passed since it was rendered, and this particular question has many times been before different courts, not one, so far as I have found, has denied that it was correct as a whole, but many judges have objected to parts of that opinion being referred to as announcing the doctrine that it supports without question the claim that it is for the witness alone to pass upon the constitutional right of refusing to answer, independent of the court or the circumstances under which the witness is placed at the time. Let us see what Justice Marshall says. Among other things, following the statement, that has been referred to in the main opinion here, 49 L. R. A.

that he is at liberty to refuse to answer if he will say upon his oath that his answer to that question might criminate him, comes this language: "When this opinion was first suggested, the court conceived the principle laid down at the bar to be too broad, and therefore required that authorities in support of it might be adduced. Authorities have been adduced and have been considered. In all of them the court could perceive that an answer to the question propounded might criminate the witness, and he was informed that he was at liberty to refuse an answer. These cases do not appear to the court to support the principle laid down by the counsel for the witness in the full latitude in which they have stated it. There is no distinction which takes from the court the right to consider and decide whether any direct answer to the particular question propounded could be reasonably supposed to affect the witness. There may be questions no direct answer to which could in any degree affect him; and there is no case which goes so far to say that he is not bound to answer such questions. The Case of Gooseley, Fed. Cas. No. 15,230, in this court, is perhaps the strongest that has been adduced. But the general doctrine of the judge in that case must have referred to the circumstances which showed that the answer might criminate him. When two principles come in conflict with each other, the court must give them both a reasonable construction, so as to preserve them both to a reasonable extent. The principle which entitles the United States to the testimony of every citizen, and the principle by which every witness is privileged not to accuse himself, can neither of them be entirely disregarded. They are believed both to be preserved to a reasonable extent, and according to the true intention of the rule and of the exception to that rule, by observing that course which it is conceived courts have generally observed." Fed. Cas. No. 14,692e.

In the case of Kirschner v. State, 9 Wis. 140, we find the following language: "Although the witness is the judge of the effect of his answer, and is not bound to disclose any facts or circumstances to show how the answer would affect him, as that would defeat the rule, and destroy the protection afforded by the law, yet the court is to determine, under all the circumstances of the case, whether such is the tendency of the question put to him, and whether he shall be required to answer; as otherwise it would be in the power of every witness to deprive parties of the benefit of his testimony by a merely colorable pretense that his answers to questions would have a tendency to implicate him in some crime or misdemeanor, or would expose him to a penalty of forfeiture, when it is clear, as we think it was in this case, that the questions have no such tendency."

In Calhoun v. Thompson, 56 Ala. 166, 28 Am. Rep. 754, the court says: "In the first instance it is the province of the court to determine whether any direct answer to the question proposed will furnish criminating evidence against the witness. If it is not apparent such would be the tendency of the answer, the witness is not privileged from testifying. While it is of the highest importance to protect the witness from self-incrimination, it is also of importance that the privilege the law extends to him should not be perverted to the suppression of evidence which can be safely given."

In the case of Richman v. State, 2 G. Greene, 532, the court says: "When it is evident to the mind of the court that the answer cannot accuse the witness, the court should require him to respond to the interrogatory. If this were not the case, it would be in the power of the witness, when called upon to give testimony in a criminal case, to refuse to do so. If he is to be the sole judge whether the answer would implicate him by thus answering, it would be impossible to elicit any testimony. Perjury could not only be committed with impunity, by stating that the answer would criminate him, but the guilty would be screened from merited punishment. We cannot sanction a rule fraught with such dangerous consequences. The direct tendency of such a rule would be to suppress truth, and prevent the administration of justice. Therefore, we think the better and safer rule to be that of compelling the witness to answer, when it is apparent to the court that such answer would not interfere with his legal privilege."

The United States circuit court for the southern district of New York, in the case of United States v. McCarthy, 21 Blatchf. 469, 18 Fed. Rep. 87, announce the rule to be as follows: "It is not sufficient to excuse the witness from answering that he may in his own mind think his answer to the question might by possibility lead to some criminal charge against him, or tend to convict him of it if made. The court must be able to perceive that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer. Queen v. Boyes, 1 Best & S. 311; Wharton, Ev. § 538."

The supreme court of Iowa, upon this subject, in the case of State v. Duffy, 15 Iowa, 427, have this to say: "The true rule upon this subject will be found discussed by Chief Justice Marshall (1 Burr, Tr. 244, Fed. Cas. No. 14,692e), and in People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 230, 21 Am. Dec. 122; Bellinger v. People, 8 Wend. 595, and the cases there cited. . . . It is not left alone for the witness to determine whether the answer would tend to criminate him. He is not required to explain how he would be criminated, for this would or might annihilate the protection secured by this rule; but it is for the court to determine 'whether the answer can criminate him, directly or indirectly, by furnishing direct evidence of his guilt, or by establishing one of the many facts which together may constitute a chain of testimony sufficient to warrant his conviction, but one of which itself could not produce such result.'"

During the discussion of the case of Queen v. Boyes, a case that has been referred to so many times, Justice Blackburn said: "Taylor refers to an American case (People v. 49 L. R. A.

Mather, 4 Wend. 229, 21 Am. Dec. 122) where Marcy, J., delivered the judgment of the court, and, after a learned and elaborate argument, decided that the witness there was not obliged to answer. His conclusion is (p. 257, Am. Dec. p. 144): 'I think the judge could not safely say that the privilege was claimed by the witness in this case as a mere subterfuge to suppress the truth, and thereby aid the escape of the guilty.' That is the reason of the decision, and it is a very sensible rule to go by."

In the case of State v. Kent, 5 N. D. 555, 35 L. R. A. 518, 67 N. W. 1063, the court makes use of the following language: "We must not be understood to mean that, in every case where a witness under oath claims his privilege on the ground that his answer will tend to criminate him, the privilege will be granted. Ordinarily it will, and the witness cannot be required to specify in what manner his answer may be incriminating. This would be to destroy the privilege. But, when a court can discover no reasonable theory upon which the answer could be incriminating, further investigation may be made, or the privilege denied. A witness will not be permitted to make any fraudulent use of his privilege."

In the case of State v. Thaden, 43 Minn. 253, 45 N. W. 447, Justice Mitchell makes use of the following language: "The first error assigned is the ruling of the trial court in compelling this witness to answer certain questions, he having previously declined to do so, claiming that the same might tend to criminate himself. While no principle of the common law is more firmly established than that which affords a witness the privilege of refusing to answer any question which will criminate himself, yet its application is attended with practical difficulties. To hold that the witness himself is the sole and absolute judge whether the answer will criminate him would be to place it in his power to withhold evidence whenever he saw fit. Such a rule could not be tolerated for a moment. On the other hand, to require him to state what answer he would have to give, or to explain fully how his answer would tend to criminate, would deprive him of the very protection which the law designs to afford. Moreover, the reason of the rule forbids that it should be limited to confessions of guilt, or statements which may be proved in subsequent prosecutions as admissions of facts sought to be established therein; but it should be extended to the disclosure of any fact which might constitute an essential link in a chain of evidences by which guilt might be established, although the fact alone would not indicate any crime. Hence, the problem is how to administer the rule so as to afford full protection to the witness, and at the same time prevent simulated excuses. All the authorities agree to the general proposition that the statement of the witness that the answer will tend to criminate himself is not necessarily conclusive, but that this is a question which the court will determine from all the circumstances of the particular case, and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called upon to give. But the question on which the cases seem to differ is as to what we may call the burden of proof; some holding that the statement of the witness must be accepted as true unless it affirmatively appears from the circumstances of the particular case that he is mistaken or acts in bad faith, while other cases hold that to entitle a witness to the privilege of silence the court must be able to see, from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence called for, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness if he is compelled to answer. The following are a few of the leading cases treating on this subject:" 1 Burr, Tr. 255, Fed. Cas. No. 14,693; Queen v. Boyes, 1 Best & S. 311; and several others. "The difference is theoretical, rather than practical; for it would be difficult to conceive of an instance where the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence called for would be entirely neutral in their probative force upon the question whether or not there was reasonable ground to apprehend that the answer might tend to criminate the witness. After consideration of the question, and an examination of the authorities, our conclusion is that the best practical rule is that laid down in some of the English cases, and adopted and followed by Chief Justice Cockburn in Queen v. Boyes, 1 Best & S. 311: 'That to entitle a party called as a witness to the privilege of silence the court must see from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer.' To this we would add that, when such reasonable apprehension of danger appears, then, inasmuch as the witness alone knows the nature of the answer he would give, he alone must decide whether it would criminate him. This, we think, is substantially what Chief Justice Marshall meant by his statement of the rule in the Burr trial. As was said in Queen v. Boyes, 1 Best & S. 311, the danger to be apprehended must be real and appreciable with reference to the ordinary operations of law, in the ordinary course of things; not a danger of an imaginary or unsubstantial character, having reference to some extraordinary and possible contingency, so improbable that no reasonable man would suffer it to influence his conduct. A merely remote and naked possibility, out of the ordinary course of the law, and such as no reasonable man would be affected by, should not be suffered to obstruct the administration of justice."

"To entitle a person called as a witness to the privilege of silence, the court must see from all the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called on to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend that the evidence may tend to criminate him if he is compelled to answer. The danger to be apprehended must be real and appreciable with reference to the ordinary operation of law, in the ordinary course of things, and not imaginary or unsubstantial, or a mere remote and naked possibility." The above is found in the syllabus of a case in [State v. Thaden] 43 Minn. 253, 45 N. W. 447. The case is all in point, but particularly the statement that, in claiming exemption, the witness did not claim that an answer would criminate, but that it might criminate. The same distinction is here.

Chief Justice Brickell, in the case of Calhoun v. Thompson, 56 Ala. 169, 28 Am. Rep. 754, says: "The humane maxim of the law is that no one is bound to accuse himself. A witness, though a party to the suit, cannot be compelled to answer any question the answering of which may expose or tend to expose him to a criminal charge or to any kind of punishment. 2 Phillips, Ev. 929; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 451. In the first instance, it is the province of the court to determine whether any direct answer to the question proposed will furnish criminating evidence against the witness. If it is not apparent such would be the tendency of the answer, the witness is not privileged from testifying. While it is of the highest importance to protect the witness from self-crimination, it is also of importance that the privilege the law extends to him should not be perverted to the suppression of evidence that can be safely given. 2 Phillips, Ev. 933. We cannot discover that the evidence sought to be elicited could have the least tendency to criminate the witness."

"The argument of counsel assumes that, in this proceeding by writ of habeas corpus, we can inquire into and correct nearly all errors which may have been committed by the district court in the control of the case originally. This has been so often denied by this court, and the proposition is so clear that in a writ of habeas corpus nothing can be inquired into but the jurisdiction of the court, that it is unnecessary to pursue the entire line of argument by counsel for appellant. Re Cuddy, 131 U. S. 280, 33 L. ed. 154, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 703." Above found in Re Wight, 134 U. S. 148, sub nom. Wight v. Nicholson, 33 L. ed. 870, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490.

Ex parte Senior, 37 Fla. 1, 32 L. R. A. 133, 19 So. 652, is a case that is interesting, and discusses the Counselman Case, that has been referred to many times, reported in 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195, and several other cases. After referring to the language of Chief Justice Marshall in the Burr Case, this decision says: "The authorities agree that the right of privilege against compelling disclosure of incriminating evidence is personal to the witness, he alone being entitled to invoke its protection, and that it may be waived by him. Whether the court or the witness has the right to determine the question of privilege or to what extent the claim of privilege is left to the determination of the witness, has not been so uniformly stated in the decisions. It has never been recognized that he alone has the right in all cases to decide whether his answer will tend to criminate him. Such a rule would be mischievous, and enable unscrupulous witnesses to defeat the ends of justice in many cases." And this opinion goes on and learnedly points out distinctions that can be drawn from opinions that seem to decide otherwise.

The Georgia case, referred to in the opinion of this court in this case, was a civil action for personal injuries against a railway company, and part of the syllabus of the case is as follows: "A party, though introduced as a witness in his own behalf, may, upon cross-examination as to matters not voluntarily testified about on his direct examination, decline to give testimony which would tend to criminate him, or to bring infamy, disgrace, or public contempt upon himself or his family, notwithstanding the fact that at a previous trial of the case he had waived his privilege of remaining silent as to these matters. A waiver of this kind is not binding upon a witness at a trial subsequent to that at which the waiver was made." And in the opinion the court says: "Ordinarily, the accused in a criminal case has no right to testify at all, and generally, if not universally, statutes conferring this privilege expressly, or in effect, annex as a condition that he must submit to the fullest cross-examination. He pays this price for the benefit of swearing for himself. We have, in Georgia, no statute allowing the accused in a criminal case to be sworn as a witness, and our statute allowing parties in civil cases to testify in their own behalf contains no condition in any manner abridging their rights or privileges as witnesses arising under our Constitution, or the above-cited sections of the Code. . . . The second trial is a de novo investigation before another jury, whose duty it is to consider the case in the light only of the evidence adduced at that hearing." Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Lybrend, 90 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794.

The case of Temple v. Com. 75 Va. 892, referred to, was a case where the witness thought he was under arrest, and was taken before the grand jury and gave evidence, was committed to jail for want of a bond to appear as a witness, and while in jail was advised of his constitutional right. The court makes the ruling referred to entirely consistent, and the following is some of the language used: "In the case before us it appears that the plaintiff in error, while held in jail as a witness, consulted with counsel, who advised him that he would criminate himself, if he testified in the case against Berry, and gave the same testimony which he had given before the grand jury. The court might well have inquired into the fact whether he had actually received such advice of counsel; or if it believed that such counsel was disreputable, and that the advice was given simply to protect the offender, or to shield a contumacious or bribed witness,—all these matters might have been properly inquired into by the court." And Justice Staples, in his separate opinion concurring, says: "No suggestion is made here that the witness was contumacious, or that his answer would not tend to criminate him."

In the case of Samuel v. People, 164 Ill. 379, 45 N. E. 728, where it is held that a witness does not lose his constitutional right by reason of the fact that he has made affidavit on the information to the truth of the statements therein contained, the court proceeds to show that such affidavit was not a necessary part of the procedure, and, after referring to the Virginia case last above cited with approval, says: "In what is here said we merely hold that, if the witness was entitled to claim his privilege in this case, he did not waive his right to claim such privilege by reason of having made the affidavit upon the information."

As to the applicant's right of appeal I submit the following:

Section 3126 of the Revised Statutes of Wyoming is as follows: "An order affecting a substantial right in an action, when such order in effect determines the action and prevents a judgment, and an order affecting a substantial right, made in a special proceeding, or upon a summary application in an action, after judgment, is a final order which may be vacated, modified or reversed, as provided in this chapter. [S. L. 1886, chap. 60, § 778; R. S. O. § 6707.]" And § 3128 is as follows: "A judgment rendered or final order made by the district court, may be reversed, vacated or modified by the supreme court, for errors appearing on the record. [S. L. 1886, chap. 60, § 780; R. S. O. § 6709.]" If a construction of these sections by the supreme court of Ohio was had prior to their adoption, such construction became a part of the law of Wyoming, as all will admit; and a decision of a supreme court upon a statute identical with ours is, to say the least, persuasive. In the case of Re Collier (1856) 6 Ohio St. 56, on habeas corpus, the court makes use of the following language: "This proceeding is brought here by the marshal, on certiorari. It is supposed that he relied, in the adoption of this form, on the 10th section of the amendatory act securing the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, passed February 8, 1847, Swan's Rev. Stat. p. 451, which provides 'that the proceedings on any writ of habeas corpus shall be recorded by the clerks, and may be reviewed on writs of error and certiorari as in other cases now provided by law.' At the time of this enactment, writs of error and of certiorari were, by law, the remedies in use for reviewing and correcting proceedings at law, in civil or criminal cases; but the 530th section of the Code, which took effect July 1, 1853, declares that writs of error and certiorari, to reverse, vacate, or modify judgments or orders in civil cases, are abolished; and the petition in error is, by § 515 of the Code, substituted in their place. We regard this in the nature of a civil proceeding; but, if it be in the nature of a criminal proceeding against a prisoner charged with crime, it is subject to the fatal objection that no such remedy can be maintained in favor of the prosecution against the defendant. The right to prosecute a writ of error or certiorari against one who is indicted and tried for a crime or offense is not given to the state, nor to those who prosecute offenders under its laws. Section 604 of the Code enacts 'that until the legislature shall otherwise provide, this Code shall not affect proceedings on habeas corpus,' etc. It may be claimed that this clause, by its peculiar phraseology, saves the habeas corpus act, and all of the remedies given by it, from the operations of the Code. The word 'proceedings' includes, we think, nothing more than the doings of the judge who allows the writ, and is limited to the hearing before him. The filing of a petition in error is a proceeding before another tribunal. It is new in its character, and effects a review of the decision of the judge, without forming any part of the case before him. The allowance of the writ, the bringing forward of the petitioner before the judge, the inquiry into the cause of his caption and detention, the introduction of evidence, and the liberation or other disposal of the relator, are all to be governed by the act relating thereto; and, as to other questions, to be determined by some other tribunal, though arising out of the case made on the writ, the Code prescribes the form by which they are to be governed. We adopt this construction the more willingly as it secures uniformity of practice in cases of error in civil proceedings, which seems to be a prominent object of the Code (see § 605), and, if carried out, will be found useful to the profession. The writ is dismissed for want of jurisdiction."

If it be urged that § 2128, Rev. Stat., does not apply, because reference is made to the district court only, an inspection of the case of King v. King (1882) 38 Ohio St. 370, will disclose a construction of that section which makes it applicable to proceedings before a judge at chambers. In that case the court says: "A judge of the court of common pleas is ex officio a judge of the district court, and as such is empowered to grant temporary alimony pending an appeal with respect to permanent alimony. 72 Ohio Laws, § 9, p. 145; 75 Ohio Laws, § 13, p. 749; Rev. Stat. § 5701. The order thus made in such special proceedings (75 Ohio Laws, p. 726; 2 Rev. Stat. 1880, p. 1361) is in its nature final, and may be reviewed on error (75 Ohio Laws, § 1, p. 804; Rev. Stat. § 6707; O'Donnell v. O'Donnell, 1 Disney (Ohio) 299; Brigel v. Starbuck, 34 Ohio St. 280; Carpenter v. Cincinnati & W. Canal Co. 35 Ohio St. 307, 315; Foss v. Foss, 100 Ill. 576; 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 406). While the better practice is for the judge making such order to sign it, this is not essential to its validity, where, as here, it was entered on the journal by direction of the judge as required by statute (Rev. Stat. §§ 4963, 5331; Osburn v. State, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 212); and the provisions as to signing the journal which the former practice act contained (Sheehan v. Davis, 17 Ohio St. 571) were not carried into the Code." In line with the foregoing is the decision of this court in O.D. Smith Drug Co. v. Casper Drug Co. 5 Wyo. 510, 40 Pac. 979, 42 Pac. 213, by the use of the following language: "An objection is made that no proceedings in error could have been instituted in the case, as the order discharging the attachment was not a final order, and is not appealable under our Code. Under Code provisions similar to ours, the 49 L. R. A.

courts of last resort in other states have held that the order dissolving or sustaining an attachment is a final order, affecting the substantial rights of the parties, and may be reviewed, without bringing up the whole case, after final judgment; and this is undoubtedly the correct rule, even though there is no direct statutory provision in our Code authorizing an appeal in such cases, except as to final orders generally. Watson v. Sullivan, 5 Ohio St. 42; Harrison v. King, 9 Ohio St. 388; Adams County Bank v. Morgan, 26 Neb. 148, 41 N. W. 993."

The fact that this court in this proceeding cannot review the decision of Judge Scott of the district court in the proceeding before him on habeas corpus cannot be denied, and is not claimed. I feel warranted, in view of the importance of this case, to refer to some of the authorities on that subject briefly. The supreme court of Nevada, in Ex parte Winston, 9 Nev. 71, says: "A habeas corpus is not a writ of error. It cannot be used to authorize appellate jurisdiction. On a habeas corpus the judgment of an inferior court cannot be disregarded. We can look at the record to see whether a judgment exists, and have no power to say whether it is right or wrong. It is conclusively presumed to be right until reversed, and, when the imprisonment is under process valid on its face, it will be deemed prima facie legal; and, if the petitioner fails to show a want of jurisdiction in the magistrate or court whence it emanated, his body must be remanded to custody,"—citing several authorities. In Ex parte Shaw, 7 Ohio St. 81, 70 Am. Dec. 55, we find the following: "Questions of doubtful jurisdiction are frequently involved in a record, which are proper subjects of consideration upon a writ of error, and which should not, therefore, be entertained or decided upon habeas corpus. . . . It is said to be the practice in some parts of this state to use the writ of habeas corpus as a short and summary mode of reviewing as upon a writ of error, and annulling the sentences of courts. If this be so, it is an abuse of the writ of habeas corpus which cannot be too soon corrected." I can see no force in the argument that a law shall be considered of less effect by reason of the arrangement of the statute. Whether it be in the Code of Civil Procedure, or included in the provisions as to habeas corpus, it is the law just the same. The fact that probate judges were given jurisdiction in habeas corpus and mandamus only shows that an unconstitutional attempt was made to confer upon citizens of the territory certain judicial powers that were being exercised by those in whose selection they had no voice or vote.

While it was admitted, in the argument of this case, that the proceedings had before Justice Scott of the district court on habeas corpus were only made a part of the petition for the reason that the law required it to be done where a second application is made, and it was conceded that those proceedings could not be reviewed here on this proceeding, still we find, all through the hearing and in the final judgment, reference to what was done by, or in the proceeding before, Justice Scott; as, for instance, the question of good faith was not referred to in the justice's court. The affidavit made by Miskimins to obtain a requisition first came into the case during the proceedings before Justice Scott; and, as it is referred to in the opinion of the court at considerable length, I desire to set it out in full, calling attention to the fact that it was made in the presence of the justice of the peace, who also knew all the circumstances of the making of the affidavit by the prosecuting attorney, and of his virtually having withdrawn the same, and who, upon the examination before him as committing magistrate, when the applicant refused to make answer to the questions (which are set out in the opinion of the court, and it would be well to read), refused to allow the claimed privilege of applicant, because there was nothing in the questions, nor in the case or its surroundings, nor did the witness make it appear in any way, that the answer to the questions as propounded would in the remotest possibility tend to criminate him; and if he committed error in this finding and judgment, it cannot, as I claim, be reviewed on habeas corpus. Here is the affidavit:

Affidavit.

The State of Wyoming, } ss.
County of Laramie.

John Miskimins, of the county of Laramie, in the state of Wyoming, being first duly sworn according to law, upon his oath says as follows: That he is the principal and complaining witness against Clifford W. Lang and James Raff, who have fled from the justice of the state; that the application for a requisition is made in good faith, for the sole purpose of punishing the accused, and that he does not desire or expect to use the prosecution for the purpose of collecting a debt, or for any private purpose, and that he will not directly or indirectly use the same for any of said purposes. Affiant further says that on or about the 11th day of July, A. D. 1899, at the county of Laramie, in the state of Wyoming, James Raff represented to John Miskimins, this affiant, that he, James Raff, was worth the sum of fifteen thousand ($15,000.00) dollars, which amount he desired to invest in cattle; that he had come out here to Wyoming for that purpose; that thereupon Clifford W. Lang represented to John Miskimins, this affiant, that he, the said Clifford W. Lang, was the owner of sixty head of cattle, that said cattle were ranging on the ranch of Bert Wilkins, in Converse county, Wyoming, and that he, the said Clifford W. Lang, desired to dispose of the same; that James Raff would purchase the said bunch of cattle, if the said bunch of cattle was larger in point of numbers; that the said James Raff said to this affiant that Clifford W. Lang was the owner of a small bunch of cattle, that he also held an interest in the Woolstein Liquor Company, that he was very foolish for selling his cattle, and that the cattle were worth more money than Lang asked for them. Affiant further says that Clifford W. Lang represented to this affiant that he, the said Clifford W. Lang, was desirous of getting out of the cattle business, and proposed to sell to John Miskimins, this affiant, the whole bunch of cattle for the sum of nineteen dollars and fifty cents ($19.50) per head; that this affiant, believing the said Clifford W. Lang to be the owner of said cattle, purchased the cattle from the said Clifford W. Lang; that he paid therefor the sum of eleven hundred and thirty dollars ($1,130.00), by a sight draft on the Flato Commission Company of South Omaha, Neb., payable to the order of C. W. Lang. Affiant further says that thereupon the said Clifford W. Lang cashed the said draft at the First National Bank of Cheyenne; that thereupon he said to this affiant that he would take the next train for Salt Lake City, but was found by this affiant on the outgoing train bound for the city of Denver; that on this affiant meeting the said Clifford W. Lang on the said Denver train, he, the said Clifford W. Lang, frankly admitted to this affiant that the cattle deal had been a bogus one, but that he, the said Clifford W. Lang, had turned $1,130.00 over to his confederate, the said James Raff, who had gone on ahead, and was awaiting him at Evans, Colorado, and if he, this affiant, would accompany him to Evans, Colo., the $1,130.00 would be returned to this affiant. Affiant further says that thereupon he accompanied the said Clifford W. Lang to Evans, Colo., and that upon their arrival at Evans, Colo., they proceeded to a room over a saloon of one O'Grady, where he was confronted by James Raff, Clifford W. Lang, and Elmer Luther; that when this affiant demanded restitution of the $1,130.00, the said Clifford W. Lang drew from a valise a revolver, with which he threatened to kill this affiant, using these words: "You son of a bitch, this is a game, and you got the worst of it. I sold you no cattle, and if you do not go back to Cheyenne, and keep your mouth shut, I will blow your light out." Affiant further says that Elmer Luther, on the 12th day of July, at the county of Weld, in the state of Colorado, shook his fist in this affiant's face, and said as follows: "You came down here to skin us, God damn you: but you got the worst of it. I have got the money. You better go back to Cheyenne, and keep your damned mouth shut, or some of us will get you." Affiant further says that the said Clifford W. Lang and the said James Raff have fled from the justice of this state, and are now in the state of Colorado: that they are now detained in the Weld county jail, at Greeley, at the instance of this affiant; that the aforesaid fugitives were in the state of Wyoming on the 11th day of July, A. D. 1899, at the time of the commission of this felony. And further affiant sayeth not.

John Miskimins.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 14th day of July, A. D. 1899.

Justice of the Peace.

Counsel, by an ingenious appeal to the humanitarian application of habeas corpus, have partially hidden the possible effect of a decision for which they contend and have secured. I desire to call attention to some of the statements in the able opinion just rendered: "It is urged in this case that the witness had already made statements inquired about by the question propounded, and that to rehearse them as formerly stated, which he must do to make a true answer, could not by any possibility incriminate him. But, independently of the considerations, to be adverted to more fully hereafter in this opinion, that subsequent acts of the witness, such as compounding the felony, might have intervened, changing his attitude in the premises," etc. Page 840 of the opinion of this court. And again on page 842, the following language: "In this case, however, the crime of compounding a felony if committed by the witness, must have been committed after the affidavit in the requisition proceedings had been made; and the latter, therefore, can hardly throw much light upon the question of his good faith in declining to testify upon the subsequent trial." Applying this law, which, as I claim, becomes such here and now for the first time, to the facts in the case, most of them as shown by the opinion of this court, a witness may instigate and institute a criminal prosecution. Afterwards (the parties complained of being outside the jurisdiction of the court and in another state) he may, for the purpose of securing a requisition, make an affidavit, setting forth such facts as show that an infamous crime has been committed, and that he was the victim of that crime, and showing that without his evidence there could not possibly be a case presented. Upon such a showing the chief executive of the state must issue a requisition, and does. The parties complained of are apprehended and presented for a preliminary examination before a court of competent jurisdiction. The witness originally complaining, being the petitioner here, failing to appear, although duly subpoenaed, is charged by the prosecuting officer on affidavit with compounding a felony. The opinion here says of the affidavit: "It was made under oath by the proper officer. It is not to be presumed that it was made without some basis of evidence tending to support it." Afterwards, the witness appearing without having been arrested upon any warrant issued by reason of the making of said affidavit, and there being then no evidence remaining after he had appeared that he had even attempted to compound a felony, the proceeding, so far as it had gone, was withdrawn and annulled. The witness can then be sworn, and take the stand, and refuse to answer questions based upon statements to instigate the procedure, and sworn to for the purpose of apprehending the defendants then and there on examination, because and for the reason that by answering such questions so propounded, he might incriminate himself of what he does not say and never has said. His counsel first said perjury, because the prosecuting attorney announced in the justice court that if the witness did not answer in a certain way he would proceed against him for perjury; but that reason seems to have been abandoned. And now it is said that, after he was subpoenaed as a witness in the case he had caused to be instituted, he may have compounded a felony. He has never said so, and, as is correctly stated, was not bound to say so, nor that he had committed perjury. The justice who was holding the examination, and who, it appears, was familiar with all the facts, could not see any possible danger to the witness by answering the questions, and ordered him to do so, and, upon his refusal, committed him for contempt; and a judge of the district court, reviewing the action of the magistrate on habeas corpus, after listening to all the evidence that was introduced before the magistrate, and more, could not find, from all or any of the circumstances of the case, any ground for claiming the privilege, and ordered the witness to answer, and, upon his refusing so to do, remanded him to the custody of the sheriff, stating, at the same time, that he did not believe that the claim was made by the witness in good faith, and that the judgment of the court that had jurisdiction of the case should not be disturbed. And I am of the same opinion, and that if, after instituting the prosecution and twice telling the facts, once being under oath when it was a necessary part of the proceeding, and while under the restraint of a legal subpoena to tell them again, he compounded a felony in the case, it was too late for him to plead, or be to him of any avail under the humane provision of our Constitution that declares that no one shall be compelled to give evidence against himself.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

J. THOMPSON MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

Gilbert S. GUNDERSON, Respt.

(.....Wis.....)

1. If machines manufactured under a contract depart from the specifications with the knowledge and consent of the purchaser he cannot hold the manufacturer responsible in damages for their failure to work.

2. Departure from specifications in machines manufactured under a contract will be waived by taking them and failing to give timely notice of nonacceptance because of noncompliance with the contract.

3. It is error not to submit to the jury facts fairly in the case.

4. No warranty that shoes and gatherers of tobacco-planting machines will scour in the ordinary soil of the locality is implied in a contract to manufacture the machines and make the shoes and gatherers of steel.

5. Lost profits on the entire lot of machines cannot be recovered for failure to manufacture them according to the specifications of the contract, where one, at least, has been accepted and paid for.
6. A manufacturer of machines under contract may recover their value as chattels, notwithstanding their unfitness for the purpose intended, if the vendee retains them without any offer to return them.

(April 6, 1900.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rock County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the contract price for the manufacture of certain machines. Reversed.

Statement by Bardeen, J.:

This action is brought to recover on a written contract for the manufacturing of fifty tobacco transplanting machines in the year 1892, at $40 each, and on a verbal contract for remodeling the same machines in 1893, at $5 each. Credit was allowed for $891.12, and judgment was demanded for $1,358.88 and interest. The issue tendered was that only thirty-nine of the fifty machines were made, and they were not made according to the contract, by reason whereof they would not work properly, and defendant lost the sale of the same. By way of counterclaim, defendant set up that a part of said machine known as "gatherers" was not made, according to the model, of hard plow steel, would not scour, and the machine would not work properly, whereby said machines were a total loss to the defendant. On the trial, evidence was offered that the steel shoes of the machines were not made of the proper kind of steel, and would not scour, and the defendant was permitted to amend his answer at the close of the testimony to cover this alleged defect. The court submitted the question of the defects mentioned to the jury, with instructions that, if they found such defects existed, they might find a verdict for defendant for the amount he had paid to plaintiff, together with the profits defendant might have made on the fifty machines. The jury brought in a verdict for defendant for $889, from which the court required the defendant to remit $20, as a condition of denying a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. Judgment was entered for defendant, from which the plaintiff has taken this appeal.

Messrs. J. B. Dow, William Smith, and A. A. Jackson, for appellant:

The language used in the contract is inconsistent with an implied warranty with respect to the working of the machine.

bolt & B. Iron Co. v. Topliff, 85 Wis. 513, 55 N. W. 854.

Bardeen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are involved in a great deal of doubt and uncertainty. Indeed, the confusion is so great that the labors of the court have been greatly increased in endeavoring to arrive at the ultimate rights of the parties. The contract regarding which the main controversy has arisen is as follows:

"Beloit, Wis., May 18th, 1892.

G. S. Gunderson, Beloit, Wis.:

We will make and furnish and complete fifty tobacco transp. machines, built like your model planter, except we will furnish steel shoes instead of cast-iron, for the sum of forty dollars ($40.00) each. We are not to guaranty working of machines. You assume all risk, and will sell, set up, and start all machines, and get settlement for same. You to pay us six hundred dollars ($600) cash now, and the balance to be settled by cash or good notes within ninety days.

Respectfully,

J. Thompson & Sons Mfg. Co.

Accepted. G. S. Gunderson.

Under this contract the plaintiff claims to have manufactured fifty machines, thirty-nine of which were delivered, and the remainder were held in the shop subject to defendant's order. It appears that the defendant was the inventor of the machine. It had been tested to a limited extent during the years prior to 1892 by a crude model made under defendant's directions. In the early part of 1892 defendant caused a complete model to be made, which was the one taken to plaintiff's shops, and was the one referred to in the contract. This model had a cast-iron instead of a steel shoe. Whether the gatherers, concerning which a great deal of controversy has arisen, were attached to the model or were simply delivered at the shops, is a matter of very much doubt. It is practically agreed, however, that the machines sent out in 1892 had no gatherers upon them, and that the defendant set up and attempted to operate his machines without them. These gatherers were made of a narrow strip of steel, polished on one side, and designed to run in the ground, and press the earth up to the plant after it had been set. In order for them to do good work, it was necessary that they scour. Their cost was about 50 cents for each machine. It will be observed that the contract calls for a steel instead of a cast-iron shoe. The evidence shows that a large number of these machines (just how many no one can tell from the evidence) were sent out with cast-iron shoes,—whether with defendant's consent and approval, or not, the evidence is equally uncertain. These facts, however, do appear: Prior to the date of the contract, plaintiff had manufactured a number of these machines,—just how many, no one appears to know. On May 14th one of the machines was sent to Spaulding, at Broadhead, and another to Wagley, at Orfordville. On May 21st another was shipped to Perrigo, and on the 25th one to Foltz, at Clinton Junction,—each with a cast-iron shoe, and without gatherers. On June 10th twenty more were sent to Spaulding. The defendant saw this consignment, and knew that they had no gatherers and had the cast-iron shoe. It is reasonably certain that the first four machines sent out had been made before the contract was drawn. It is equally certain that they were considered and treated as machines made under the contract. No one seems to be able to explain why the machines sent to Spaulding on June 10th had the cast-iron instead of the steel shoe, or why gatherers were not sent. The defendant knew of these facts before they were sent, and went out, set up and attempted to operate the machines, without the least objection. The machines worked unsatisfactorily. At defendant's request, steel shoes were sent out, but for how many machines the evidence fails to give any light. The steel shoes failed to work, because they would not scour. Only one of the machines sent out worked satisfactorily, and which was paid for. At some time before the opening of the season of 1893 the defendant bargained with plaintiff to remodel these machines according to his directions, for which he agreed to pay $5 each. Changes were made, but in how many no one seems to know. The machine was again tested in 1893, and failed to work, because the shoes and gatherers would not scour. The defendant claims that, if the machines had been made according to the contract, he could have sold the entire lot the first season, and realized a handsome profit on each one. The case was submitted to the jury on that basis, with the added qualification, stated in the charges of the court, that the law implied a further condition to the contract,—that the steel to be used in shoes and gatherers should be of such quality as would scour in the soils of this country, and, if they did not meet this requirement, it was not a compliance with the contract. We do not think the case was fairly submitted to the jury. In the first place, if the machines sent out the first year with the cast-iron shoes, and without gatherers, were sent with the knowledge and consent of defendant, he cannot hold the plaintiff responsible in damages for their failure to work. Or if, with full opportunity for examination, and knowledge on his part of the variance between the machines contracted for and the ones furnished, he took them, and failed to give the plaintiff timely notice that he did not accept them as being in compliance with the contract, the defects will be deemed waived. Such is the law of this state. Locke v. Williamson, 40 Wis. 377; Morehouse v. Comstock, 42 Wis. 626; McClure v. Jefferson, 85 Wis. 208, 54 N. W. 777. The fact that the machines were to be made like the model furnished does not alter the rule, so long as the defects complained of are obvious and conspicuous, as they were in this case. There was evidence in the case from which the jury might have inferred that the cast-iron shoes were put on by defendant's consent, and that he likewise acquiesced in sending out the machines without the gatherers. The evidence as to notice given defendant is vague and indefinite, and somewhat in dispute. Under the charge of the court, no such fact was presented to the jury; and, being fairly in the case, it was error not to so submit it. The jury might well have found a waiver of the exact conditions of the contract, under the circumstances in proof.

An important question arises as to the true construction to be given to the contract in suit. The defendant seeks to apply the rule that when a manufacturer contracts to supply an article which he produces, to be applied to a particular purpose, so that the buyer necessarily trusts to the judgment and skill of the manufacturer, there is an implied warranty that it shall be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is to be applied. This is the rule adopted by the court when he instructed the jury that the law implied an obligation on the part of plaintiff to use a quality of steel that would scour in the soils of this country. No such engagement appears on the face of the contract. The contract is to make a given number of machines according to the model, except that the shoes were to be steel instead of cast-iron. It is nothing more nor less than an executory contract to manufacture goods. The obligation imposed by the law, as stated by some of the authorities, is that the machines shall be free from any latent defect growing out of the process of manufacture. Durbrow & H. Mfg. Co. v. Cumming, 54 N. Y. Supp. 818; Cosgrove v. Bennett, 32 Minn. 371, 20 N. W. 359; Goulds v. Brophy, 42 Minn. 100, 6 L. R. A. 392, 43 N. W. 834; Carleton v. Lombard, A. & Co. 149 N. Y. 137, 43 N. E. 422; Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163. Durbrow & H. Mfg. Co. v. Cumming was a case where the plaintiff contracted to make 100 machines for sewing in sweat bands, in accordance with a model. The defense was that the machines did not work properly. The court says: "The rule is well established that, in cases of executory contracts for the manufacture and sale of goods of a particular description, there is an implied warranty that they are free from any latent defect growing out of the process of manufacture, and that this is the sole warranty that attaches to such a contract. But when there are defects in the goods which could be discovered upon inspection, and the vendee neither returns nor offers to return the property, nor gives to the vendor notice or opportunity to take it back, in the absence of a collateral warranty or agreement as to quality, he is conclusively presumed to have acquiesced, and may not thereafter complain of inferior quality."—citing Studer v. Bleistein, 115 N. Y. 316, 5 L. R. A. 702, 22 N. E. 243; Coplay Iron Co. v. Pope, 108 N. Y. 232, 15 N. E. 335. We obtain the following from Cosgrove v. Ben- nett, 32 Minn. 371, 20 N. W. 359; "The defendant insists that a warranty is, under the circumstances, to be implied, that the mill ordered should be reasonably fit for the business for which it was intended. To this we do not agree. . . . The general rule is stated to be that, when an article is ordered to be manufactured for a particular use or purpose, there is an implied warranty that it is to be reasonably fit for such use or purpose. But where, as in this case, the article ordered was to be of a particular design or pattern, well defined and understood between the parties, and the article made and delivered in pursuance of the contract conforms to the pattern or model, there is no warranty implied, further than it should be of good workmanship and material." Along the same line is the case of Gachet v. Warren, 72 Ala. 288, in which Chief Justice Brickell used the following language: "But if a manufacturer or dealer contracts to sell a known and described thing, although he may know the purchaser intends it for a specific use, if he delivers the thing sold, there is no implied warranty that it will answer or is suitable for the specific use to which the purchaser intends applying it." Another case very frequently cited is Whitmore v. South Boston Iron Co. 2 Allen, 52, and which fully sustains the general doctrine. In Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572, it is said that where a specific article is ordered and furnished, although the purchaser states the purpose to which he intends to apply it, there is no implied warranty on the part of the vendor that it is suitable for that purpose; and he will not, in absence of fraud or an express warranty, be held liable, however unfit and defective it may turn out to be. In further support of this same rule is Wisconsin Red Pressed Brick Co. v. Hood, 54 Minn. 543, 56 N. W. 165, which says: "If an order be given for a specified article, of a recognized kind or description, and the article is supplied, there is no warranty that it will answer the purpose described or supposed, although intended and expected to do so." The ground upon which the seller or manufacturer is held liable on the warranty is whether the purpose, and not the specified article, is the essential matter of the contract. A copious note covering the question of implied warranty on sales of personal property may be found appended to the case of McQuaid v. Ross (Wis.) 22 L. R. A. 187. A case bearing a close parallel to the one at bar is Shoenberger v. McEuen, 15 Ill. App. 406; the holding being that where one orders an article of a manufacturer, and designates a particular kind of material out of which the article is to be made in whole or in part, such material not being made by the manufacturer himself, if he uses the designated material the law does not imply a warranty as to its quality or fitness, unless it be shown that the manufacturer failed to use reasonable and ordinary care in selecting it. In Cunningham v. Hall, 4 Allen, 208, the contract was for the construction of a vessel, in which it was agreed that it should be covered with pine plank; the builder to see "that she is just right in all respects." It was held that the latter agreement was qualified by the former, and that the purchaser assumed the risk of defects which were naturally incident to pine plank and not known to the builder, and could not have been discovered by him by the exercise of reasonable care and skill. And in such case there is no implied warranty which will cover the defect. Reference has been made to the authorities in other states to show how deeply the rules thus stated are entrenched in the jurisprudence of this country. Following this line of authorities, this court held in Milwaukee Boiler Co. v. Duncan, 87 Wis. 120, 58 N. W. 232, that when a known, described, and defined article is ordered of a manufacturer, although it is stated to be required by the purchaser for a particular purpose, still, if the thing described be actually supplied, there is no warranty that it should answer the particular purpose intended by the buyer; and if the article is sold by a formal written contract, which is silent on the subject of warranty, no warranty can be ingrafted or added to the written contract. There is some language in the opinion in J. I. Case Plow Works v. Niles & S. Co. 90 Wis. 590, 63 N. W. 1013, which is supposed to encroach upon this rule. In that case the evidence tended to show that the wheels in controversy ought to have been made of refined iron. There was a stipulation against the use of defective material, and the court said, in effect, that this stipulation meant that material not suited for the purpose should not be used, and that it was no compliance with the contract to use a kind of iron unfit to be used in the manufacture of such wheels. Stress was laid upon the stipulation against the use of defective material, and it was said that this was "substantially an agreement that material not suitable to the purpose should not be used, and required that the iron for the spokes should be of the necessary grade and quality, if there was any such procurable in the market." If this is to be construed to mean that refined iron should have been used, and that such was the implied agreement, the case goes beyond any to be found in the books. If, however, the meaning intended was that the manufacturer was bound to use reasonable care in the selection of material for the wheels, and that he ought not to have used a kind of iron notoriously unfit for the purpose intended, it can easily be reconciled with the cases cited. Any broader construction than the one last suggested ought not to be sustained. This result is reached by a construction of the contract itself, and not by the interpolation of implied covenants.

Applying the principles of law hereinbefore stated to the case before us, we are satisfied that no implied warranty arose, from the contract in suit, that the steel to be used for the manufacture of the shoes and gatherers should "scour in the soils of this country." The law implied an obligation that plaintiff should use reasonable care in the selection of the materials, and that, in so far as the plaintiff's efforts entered into the manufacture of the materials, there should be no latent defects in either materials or workmanship. The proof is undisputed that plaintiff used open-hearth steel for the shoes and gatherers,—a kind of steel in common use, and a kind the plaintiff had used for many years in the manufacture of a corn planter which it had been selling, and which had worked successfully. The instruction given the jury by the court furnished no proper test of the plaintiff's liability. The court further instructed the jury that, if they found for the defendant, he might recover the profits he would have made on the entire lot of machines. This was error, because one of the machines, at least, had been accepted and paid for. The court also proceeded upon the assumption that the machines were entirely worthless. The defendant testified that they were perfect in every respect, except as to the shoes and gatherers. The evidence does not show what it would have cost to have obtained new shoes or gatherers, but it is perfectly evident therefrom that the cost would not have exceeded $5 or $6 for each machine. These portions could easily have been duplicated, and the entire machine could have been utilized. Moreover, none of the machines were returned to plaintiff. The evidence fails to disclose any basis upon which we can compute their value, but they were certainly worth something. The rule is that if the vendee retains the property, without any offer to return, he takes upon himself the burden of showing that the property purchased is entirely worthless, not only for the purpose for which it was purchased, but for every purpose. In such case the vendor may recover the real value of the chattel, if any, notwithstanding its total unfitness for the use for which it was purchased. Warder v. Fisher, 48 Wis. 338, 4 N. W. 470. In such case the measure of damages would be the difference between the contract price and the actual value, and, if the case should show special damages, the vendee would also be entitled to recoup or recover such as he had properly alleged and proved. Upon any proper theory of the case, the rule of recovery given by the court was erroneous.

Many other questions have been raised and discussed, but sufficient has been said to cover the main issues in the case, and furnish a proper guide upon another trial.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

RÉSUMÉ OF THE DECISIONS PUBLISHED IN THIS BOOK.

SHOWING the Changes, Progress, and Development of the Law during the First Quarter of the Judicial Year Beginning with October 1, 1900. Classified as Follows:

- I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.
- II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.
- III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.
- IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY.
- V. FIDUCIARIES OR REPRESENTATIVES.
- VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.
- VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; LIENS.
- VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.
- IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

Public money.

The right of the legislature to appropriate public money to pay the widow, heirs, or legal representatives of a deceased officer the salary which he would have received if he had not died is held to depend on the question whether the public good will be thereby served. (Mass.) 664.

Flag.

A state statute forbidding the use of the national flag for advertising purposes is held unconstitutional on the ground that it interferes with the constitutional privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States. (Ill.) 181.

Law of the flag.

To make the law of the flag under which a ship was sailing applicable to an action for death of a passenger by drowning upon the high seas, it is held that the drowning must be shown to have been upon the vessel. (C. C. A. 7th C.) 92.

Liberty.

An ordinance making it unlawful for any woman to enter a building where a saloon is kept, or to frequent or stand within 50 feet of it, is held unreasonable and void as an unnecessary interference with personal liberty. (Ky.) 111.

Regulation of business.

A penal ordinance prohibiting any colored netting or other material which has a tendency to conceal the true color or quality of the goods to be used for covering any box, basket, or other package of fruit, berries, or vegetables of any kind is held invalid on the ground that it is a vexatious and unreasonable interference with the rights of dealers in fruit, when it is based only on the general police power of the city. (Ill.) 657.

Franchise.

A combination by numerous persons to buy and operate a ferry, though for themselves and their families exclusively, is held 49 L. R. A.

to be in violation of a grant of an exclusive franchise to another party for limits which include the new ferry. (Ky.) 248.

Vaccination.

A statute permitting municipal authorities to make regulations for the vaccination of the inhabitants under direction of the local board of health is held to be within the power of the legislature, and an ordinance requiring compulsory vaccination is held not to be invalidated by failure to exempt persons whose health renders their vaccination unsafe. (N. C.) 588.

Courts.

The affinity of husbands of an aunt and niece is held to be such as to disqualify the one from sitting as a judge in a case where the other is an interested party. (Fla.) 548.

A statute creating a court of visitation with jurisdiction to determine railroad rates and make other regulations for the operation of railroads is held unconstitutional as an attempt to confer legislative and administrative power upon a judicial tribunal. (Kan.) 662.

Municipalities.

A constitutional limit of a city's indebtedness is held not to be exceeded by a contract for the erection by an individual of a city hall on land owned by the city, which the city agrees to lease at a fair rental, with an option to purchase it, and, if this is not exercised, with an option to the lessor to remove the building or buy the land, where it does not appear that the current revenues of the city will not be sufficient to pay the rent annually with all other necessary expenses. (Ind.) 795.

A municipality which leaves a trench filled with deadly gas in a public street near a playground, with easy means of access to the bottom, without notice or warning of the danger, is held liable for the death of a 55 865 person who goes into the trench to rescue a boy who had gone into it to get a ball, and had been overcome by the gas. (Pa.) 715.

De facto town.

A bona fide attempt to incorporate a town under a statute authorizing the incorporation is held sufficient to make orders issued by the town which there has been an attempt to organize enforceable. (Wis.) 443.

Highways.

A license fee for the use of streets by private vehicles is held not to be within the power conferred upon a city for regulating the use of streets. (Ill.) 408.

A boy riding a bicycle, as he approaches a corner and meets a team coming round the corner, is held entitled to conform to the law of the road, and to an ordinance requiring vehicles to keep to the right, unless some reason is shown for an exception thereto. (Pa.) 764.

Election contest.

The determination by the legislature of a contest as to the office of governor is held to be beyond the power of the courts to review, where the Constitution of the state makes the legislature the sole tribunal to determine that question. (Ky.) 258.

Eminent domain.

Damages to a building by settling and cracking of the walls caused by the negligent performance of public work is held to give no right to assess damages therefor in the eminent domain proceeding, though the Constitution of the state allows damages for property "injured." (Pa.) 600.

See also Telephone company, infra, III.

Taxation.

A patented article which is leased or rented by the patentee for a valuable consideration is held to be taxable at its true value in money, although that value is enhanced by reason of the patent. (Ohio) 427.

The exemption from taxation for a term of years of manufacturing companies, as a condition of their locating in a town, is held not to violate a constitutional provision declaring that the burdens of the state ought to be fairly distributed among its citizens. (R. I.) 604.

An agreement that a city will pay the taxes assessed against a water company for a term of years in return for a supply of water is held not to be contrary to public policy. (Me.) 294.

A charity for the benefit of the members of the Masonic Order, their widows, children, or others directly or indirectly connected with the order, is held not to be a purely public charity for the purpose of exemption from taxation. (Ky.) 252.

School tax.

A statute allowing pupils from outside the district to attend a high school free, but requiring the county to pay a certain sum as tuition out of the general county fund, is held invalid, where this sum may be greater or less than the actual cost of the tuition, since it may impose double taxation upon the inhabitants of the district. (Neb.) 343.

Assessments.

The rule that assessments for local improvements must be limited to the benefits received is fully adopted in an Indiana case which upholds a statute providing for assessments by frontage, where there is a provision for hearing of grievances before the final assessment, as the court holds that there is an implied obligation to change the frontage assessment if it is more than the benefits. (Ill.) 797.

A statute providing for the assessment of the expense of draining lands upon all persons deemed benefited thereby is held unauthorized by the New York Constitution providing for drains over lands of others upon just compensation, as this is held to contemplate payment by the petitioner alone. On the question whether or not such a drain is for a public use the majority of the court do not pass. (N. Y.) 781.

A rural highway is held not to be a local improvement for the cost of which a local assessment can be laid on farm lands. (Minn.) 757.

An assessment of the entire cost of taking land for a highway upon the remaining land of the same owner is held to be in violation of a constitutional provision requiring compensation for property taken for public use to be made in money, without deduction for benefits. (Ohio) 566.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

License.

An ordinance requiring a license for the sale of goods on the street or by soliciting orders from house to house is held valid as to residents of the state, against the claim that it discriminated against them in favor of nonresidents, though it might be invalid as to nonresidents. (Pa.) 446.

Uncertainty.

Partial performance.

A right to recover for the partial performance of a contract to move a building is sustained where the building was destroyed by fire after the work was partly performed. (Mass.) 562.

Failure of consideration.

The death of a stallion, preventing an exercise of the privilege of return by one who had paid for a fruitless service with an agreement for the privilege of return during the season, is held not to create any failure of consideration which will give a right to repayment. (Me.) 693.

Surety.

One who signs a note as surety after the signatures of several makers is held to guarantee the genuineness of such signatures to an innocent payee, and bound thereby, even if one of the signatures is a forgery. (Ky.) 315.

Usury.

A provision in a bond for more than the legal rate of interest after maturity, by way of a penalty to insure prompt payment of the debt, is held not to constitute usury. (Va.) 550.

Attorney's fees.

A provision in a trust deed for attorney's fees in case the property is sold under the deed is held to be void as against public policy. (N. C.) 590.

Warranty.

A warranty that shoes and gatherers of tobacco planting machines will scour in the ordinary soil of the locality is held not to be implied in a contract to manufacture the machines and make the shoes and gatherers of steel. (Wis.) 859.

Support.

An oral contract by an aged person living alone in apparent destitution, whereby she agrees to give all her property, both real and personal, but which is of no great amount, to a husband and wife in return for their maintaining, caring for, and supporting her during life and after her death giving her decent burial, is held to be one which may be specifically enforced in equity after it has been executed by the other parties in all respects, but she has failed to execute any conveyance. (W. Va.) 527.

Negotiable paper.

A bank discounting negotiable paper for one who is not its debtor, and placing the amount to his credit by way of deposit, is held not to be a purchaser of the paper. But it is not deemed sufficient to show that the paper is not purchased by showing merely that the proceeds are credited to him, without showing from the state of the account that the transaction was not such as to make the bank a purchaser. (Ill.) 412.

A stipulation in an instrument for the payment of a certain sum of money with current exchange on a place other than that of payment is held not to destroy the negotiability. (Kan.) 190.

The addition of the word "trustee" to the name of the payee of a note is held not to destroy its negotiability. (Iowa) 661.

Assignment.

An assignee of a bill of lading with draft attached, who receives payment of the draft, is held to be subject to an action for the return of the money in case the property covered by the bill does not comply with the contract. (N. C.) 679.

An assignee of a mortgage holding it as collateral, who receives his pay from the mortgagor, and thereupon surrenders the mortgage and unites in having it canceled, is held not to be liable to repay the money to the mortgagor because the latter is compelled to pay a second time to a prior assignee, whose assignment, though duly recorded, was not known to either of the parties. (N. J.) 578.

Bonds.

Statements made on the face of municipal bonds as to the purpose for which they were issued are held to constitute an estoppel against the municipality which will prevent the controverting of such statements for the purpose of invalidating the bonds in the hands of bona fide purchasers. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 534.

An action for money had and received, against the municipality, by a bona fide purchaser of bonds issued without authority in payment of a stock subscription to a foreign railroad company, which the municipality had no authority to make, is denied, although the proceeds of the bonds were used in constructing tracks and depot in the municipality, and it had received the stock certificates, and might have lawfully issued bonds to a domestic corporation. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 123.

Gas supply.

A rule of a gas company, consented to by the consumer, that it will cease to furnish gas when the consumer becomes delinquent in paying bills therefor, is held to be enforceable by discontinuing the gas supply at one set of premises until payment of a delinquent bill for gas previously furnished the consumer at other premises. (Or.) 596.

Water supply.

A water company which fails to supply sufficient water for fire purposes, although the failure is due to a breaking of the pipes without any fault of the company, is held to be liable to a consumer for the loss of property by fire, where the company had expressly contracted to furnish a supply for fire purposes. (N. J.) 572.

Insurance.

Delay for nine months to give notice of an injury is held fatal to recovery on an employer's liability policy requiring immediate notice of any injury, although the notice was sent as soon as a claim was made by the injured employee. (Ohio) 760.

A policy on the life of a person in another state is held to be within the provisions of the New York statute prohibiting the forfeiture of a policy by any life insurance company doing business in that state without giving the prescribed notice. (C. C. A. 9th C.) 132.

Beneficiaries of a life insurance policy subject to the operation of the New York laws requiring notice of accrual of premium before forfeiture for nonpayment were held not to be bound, in the absence of such a notice, by statements of the insured to the company that he cannot pay premiums, and that the company may consider the policy forfeited. (But this decision was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that the parties had agreed to abandon the contract.) (C. C. A. 9th C.) 127.

Forfeiture of a life insurance policy for noncompliance with the conditions of a premium note which were more onerous, as against the interests of the wife of the insured as beneficiary, than were the conditions of the policy itself, is held invalid, where the premium note was given by the husband without her consent, several years after the policy was issued. (Ohio) 737.

Temporary occupation of the platform of a car for a necessary or proper purpose is held not to be a "riding" thereon, within the meaning of an accident policy. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 116.

The damage to a cargo of lime by the protracted length of the voyage on account of rough weather was held not to be included within a policy of insurance. (Me.) 389.

Carriers.

A constitutional provision against contracts to limit the liability of carriers is held inapplicable to a contract of a corporation of that state made in another state for transportation to be performed entirely outside of the state. (Ky.) 557.

The ejection from a train of a child of tender years in the custody of an adult is held to be in effect the ejection and removal of the custodian, even if the latter had paid fare, and therefore requires a payment or tender to the latter of the fare paid, or the unearned part thereof, as a condition of the ejection. (Minn.) 319.

A condition on a round-trip excursion ticket sold at reduced rates, that the return coupon must be stamped, is held reasonable and enforceable, even against a passenger who cannot read, and although the rule has not been enforced in some other instances. (Tenn.) 454.

A rule of a street-railway company requiring passengers to buy tickets and board cars within the station, and compelling one who boards a car outside the station to pay fare, though he had already paid in the station, while deemed reasonable, is held to be one which must be enforced in a reasonable manner, and therefore insufficient to authorize the ejection of a passenger who, after paying fare inside the station, entered a car which had started a few feet from the station and stopped, when, if he did not take that car, he would be compelled to wait twenty minutes for another. (Tenn.) 451.

A carrier refusing to accept freight tendered for transportation is held liable for its loss by theft before the owner had opportunity after notice of refusal to make some safer disposition of it than to leave it in the warehouse at the wharf. (Ky.) 270.

The loss of perishable freight carried in refrigerator cars which are not properly refrigerated is held to make the carrier liable to the shipper, although it had leased the cars from another company, which agreed to keep them properly iced. (Va.) 462.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

Promoters who organize a corporation are denied the right to take any remuneration for their services as such unless a full statement thereof is incorporated in the prospectus, or unless it is voted to them after all the stock has been taken by the public. (Mass.) 725.

Reports.

False statements made in a report by a bank to the secretary of state, when made in good faith, believing them to be true, and because the statute required the report, are held not to create a liability for deceit; and a statute making the directors liable for receiving deposits knowing the bank to be insolvent is construed to mean actual knowledge on their part. (Mo.) 323.

Insolvency.

Payment by an insolvent bank of a check of a company in which the president of the bank is the chief stockholder, and of a note on which its directors are indorsers, is held to make an unlawful preference, although the bank has not yet committed a formal act of insolvency. (Md.) 698.

Employees.

Employment for life of a person to act as medical agent of a life insurance company is held to be beyond the power of officers under a by-law giving them authority to appoint and remove all persons, except agents, employed by the company, where the members of the board of trustees, who passed the by-law, hold office for only four years each. (N. Y.) 471.

Boycott by by-law.

A by-law of a liverymen's association prohibiting members from furnishing a hearse or carriages to nonunion liverymen or for use at a funeral conducted by such nonunion liverymen is held illegal. (Wis.) 475.

Committees and tribunals.

Interference with the decision of a committee of a board of trade is held to be within the jurisdiction of a court of equity when property rights are involved, and the decision of the committee has been made in violation of the rules of the board. (Ill.) 353.

A by-law of a board of trade which gives a committee power to investigate charges against a member in order to determine the necessity of preferring formal charges against him, though this may be done without his knowledge, and a trial before the directors had at which he is not allowed the aid of professional counsel, is held valid. (Ill.) 365.

An agreement by members of a voluntary benefit association that the decision of its tribunals rejecting a claim to benefits shall be conclusive is upheld against a contention that it violates public policy as an attempt to oust the courts of jurisdiction. (Mich.) 592.

The right to resort to the courts by a member of a fraternal organization whose claim has been finally rejected by its tribunals cannot be taken away unless it is done in the clearest and most express terms, and it is held that a constitutional provision giving the supreme lodge exclusive jurisdiction of appeals, and declaring that its decisions shall be the supreme law of the order, does not exclude resort to the courts. (Kan.) 373.

A rule of the relief department of a railroad company providing that all claims of beneficiaries should be submitted to the determination of the superintendent, whose decision should be final and conclusive unless appealed to the advisory committee, and in case of such appeal the decision of the committee should be final and conclusive upon all parties without exception or appeal, was held insufficient to bar an action in court after the rejection of a valid claim by the committee. (Ohio) 381.

Stockholders.

The rule that a stockholder cannot set off an obligation of the corporation to him against his liability as shareholder is held applicable, not only in equity, but in an action at law against him by a single creditor of the corporation. (S. C.) 448.

Liability imposed upon stockholders for debts of the corporation is held to be contractual and enforceable in foreign jurisdictions, if the statute requires no preliminary proceedings for the adjustment of equities. (Mass.) 301.

An action to enforce the liability of stockholders for corporate debts, under a statute which provides a single mode of enforcement by a single suit in the state courts in favor of all creditors and against the corporation, if it has assets, and all stockholders, is held to be maintainable only in that state, and not in any court out of the state. (Wis.) 486.

Officers.

The execution of an agreement by the president and general manager of a bank, with the approval of the vice president, is held sufficient to bind the bank without any approval or knowledge of the board of directors, where the president was allowed to do pretty much as he pleased in managing the affairs of the bank. (Cal.) 647.

Building and loan association.

A notice of withdrawal, given by a member of a building and loan association, is held not to sever his relation so completely as to preclude him from bringing suit for a receiver, when the company has not provided any fund for withdrawing members, and the stockholders have taken such action that there is no possibility of relief from that source. (Va.) 659.

Telephone company.

A telephone company is held to be entitled to exercise the power of eminent domain under a statute authorizing condemnation for "a magnetic telegraph line," where the telephone company is organized under a statute providing that the company may be organized to construct "a telegraph and telephone line," while the statute formerly provided for a corporation to organize "a telegraph or telephone line." (Tex.) 459.

Colleges.

Discrimination between regular dental colleges and other colleges authorized to grant diplomas to dentists is held constitutional, where a statute authorizes a graduate of the former to practise without being examined. (Md.) 695.

Churches.

The majority of the members of a church are held entitled to continue in control after changing their belief, where the rules of the church entitle the majority to control, and it is held that there is no implied trust that property acquired by a church shall continue to be used to teach the doctrines professed at that time. (Tex.) 617.

The right of a religious corporation to buy real estate for speculation is denied, and such contract held ultra vires. (Neb.) 337.

Free Masons.

An injunction against a chapter of Royal Arch Masons to prevent the trial of charges against a member on the ground that the rule which he is accused of violating was adopted as the result of a conspiracy is denied on the ground that the court has no power to interfere in such case with the work of the association. (Cal.) 400.

Partnership.

A contract by which the owner of a farm engages another to occupy and cultivate it, each furnishing a part of the seed, implements, and stock, with a provision that the products shall be divided at the end of a certain term, or sold and the proceeds divided, is held not to create a partnership which will give the occupant the rights of a surviving partner in case the owner dies, but only to make him a tenant or agent. (Ind.) 792.

The nature of a partnership in oil wells is considered in a case which holds that it constitutes a mining partnership which is not dissolved by the sale of the interest of one member. (W. Va.) 468.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS ; PERSONAL CAPACITY.

An infant is held not to be liable in tort for false representations as to his age, by which he procures credit on a purchase of goods. (Mass.) 560.

Dower.

The right of dower, given to a former wife divorced without alimony, if she is the innocent party, is held not to extend to the case of such a former wife if the decedent leaves another lawful wife surviving. (Conn.) 144.

Divorce.

Evidence in a suit for divorce on the ground of habitual intemperance, showing the condition and habits of the defendant since the commencement of the action, is held admissible on the ground that the interests of the state, as well as the parties, are involved, and that the condition justifying the divorce must be shown to exist at the very time it is granted. (Conn.) 142.

The abatement of a divorce proceeding by the death of the appellant pending an appeal is held to terminate the power of the court over costs, where the statute makes costs depend on the judicial determination of the action. (Cal.) 141.

Separation.

A wife living in the same house with her husband, and performing some of the duties of a wife, is not denied for that reason the right to sue for separate maintenance on the ground that the husband fails to furnish her suitable support. (Mass.) 735.

Domicil.

A woman who places her husband in a home for incurables, with his expenses for life and for burial paid, is held to have no right for that reason to acquire a separate domicil which will give jurisdiction to a probate court, although in actions for divorce there is a statutory presumption that the husband's domicil does not apply to the wife. (Cal.) 138.

V. FIDUCIARIES OR REPRESENTATIVES.

Sureties on an executor's bond are held liable for his debt to the testator, although he is insolvent, when the statute makes his debt assets for which he must account in the same way as if it were the debt of another person. (N. H.) 347.

Agency.

An insurance agent forbidden to take a risk, but whose clerk forges his name to a policy without his consent and without any profit to him, is held not to be liable for the loss on the risk. (C. C. A. 3d C.) 530.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.

A levy on property owned by and in possession of a stranger to the writ is held to create a liability on the part of the officer, and to be outside of the protection of his writ. (Tex.) 773.

Blasting.

A person who goes upon a boat at a wharf, and goes to sleep in the cabin, knowing that contractors are blasting nearby, is held to assume, as against them, all the risk of danger from the work, if it is done with reasonable care. (C. C. A. 9th C.) 108.

Blacklisting.

Placing a debtor's name on a blacklist as one who does not pay his honest debts is held to constitute a libel for which he is entitled to damages, notwithstanding the fact that he may not have paid his debt, where there was a valid counterclaim which justified its nonpayment. (Mass.) 612.

Negligence of bailees.

The negligence of a gratuitous bailee of a mule using the animal for the very purpose for which it was loaned is held to be imputable to the owner so as to prevent recovery against a third person whose negligence, combined with that of the bailee, causes the death of the mule. (Miss.) 322.

Negligence as to electricity.

Lack of insulation of electric-light wires where they run above an awning which is 16 feet above the street level is held not to be such negligence on the part of the electric company as will create a liability for the death of a person who touches a wire while upon the awning for the purpose of lifting the wires in order to allow a house to be moved under them. (Tex.) 771.

Negligent experiment.

An injured person who follows the suggestion of the physician employed by the person causing the injury, to try standing on the injured leg, is held to act at his peril if injury is thereby caused. (Mass.) 826.

Injury to employee.

A teamster of experience is held to assume the risk, as a matter of law, in using short lines, although he has complained of their insufficiency, where he continues their use for months after making his complaint without any promise of the master to remedy the defects. (Cal.) 33.

Injury by mail bag.

Negligence of a mail agent in throwing mail from a moving train, causing injury to a person standing on the platform of a station, is held to render the railroad company liable only in case the carrier had notice of his improper practice in this respect. (Mich.) 308.

Injury by street car.

A passenger who was injured after leaving a street car and while attempting to pass behind the car in the dark, by falling over a fender which had become disarranged without the knowledge of the company and was projecting from the rear of the car, is held to have no right of action against the carrier. (Mass.) 421.

Injuries by trains or cars.

A railroad company which runs its train at a prohibited speed, and fails to ring its bell as required by ordinance, or keep a proper lookout, is held not to be liable for the death of a person struck by the train, who was walking ahead of it in open daylight, on a straight piece of the road, and had power up to the last moment to step off the track and prevent the accident. (N. C.) 684.

The rule that a railroad company owes no duty to a trespasser on its track until he is discovered and the trainmen have reason to believe that he will be injured unless the train is stopped is applied to a case in which the train was running at an unlawful rate of speed, and the fact that he might have been sooner discovered is held insufficient to create liability. (C. C. A. 7th C.) 98.

A passenger alighting from a train at a place where he must cross a track to reach the public highway is held to be entitled to presume, in the absence of warning, that trains will not be so operated as to impose on him the same degree of care that would be exercised at a crossing if he were not a passenger. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 102.

The accidental death of a sick passenger who was supposed by the railway employees to be intoxicated, and who was helped from the car at the terminus of the route and led to the front of the station, at or near to the public street, and left where the way was open in which he wished to go, but who, after the train had started again on its trip, turned and went toward the back of the station and slipped between the wheels of a car moving on a track, is held to create no right of action against the carrier. (N. J.) 424.

Negligence as to fence.

The duty to keep gates in a railroad fence closed at a private farm crossing is held to be upon the landowner for whose benefit and convenience the gates are constructed. (Minn.) 625.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; LIENS.

Trademark.

The use of the word "Hygeia" as a trademark is protected, so far as the word is regarded as the name of the goddess Hygeia, but not to the extent of giving a monopoly of the English descriptive term "hygeia," as indicative of healthfulness. (Conn.) 147.

Advancements.

The allowance of interest on advancements in order to equalize the share of an heir who received none is held, where he had allowed the other heirs to enjoy their land advanced to them for many years after the ancestor's death, without taking any steps to procure a settlement of the estate, to be proper only for such reasonable time after the ancestor's death as would suffice to have the estate settled. (Tenn.) 766.

Expectancy in life insurance.

The share of a deceased beneficiary under a benefit certificate is held to be subject to a statutory rule as to a devise or legacy, and transmissible to the issue of such beneficiary if he dies during the life of the insured. (Ky.) 776.

Entireties.

A letter of credit in favor of husband and wife, purchased with the husband's money, is held to create an estate by the entireties, so that in case of his death the balance may be drawn by her without accounting therefor to his estate. (Pa.) 444.

Tenancy.

A stipulation in a deed of trust that foreclosure shall create the relation of landlord and tenant between the purchaser and mortgagor, and that upon the latter's default in surrendering possession he may be removed by a writ of unlawful detainer, is held valid. (Tenn.) 435.

Statements in letters written by a landlord to his tenant after the latter had abandoned the premises, to the effect that the premises will be leased at the tenant's risk, when they are not replied to, are held insufficient to avoid the rule that a surrender is effected by the reletting with the consent of the former tenant, on the ground that by his silence the tenant acquiesced in the landlord's proposition. (N. Y.) 580.

Cotenancy.

The right of a cotenant, who attempts, without authority, to sell logs cut by him from land owned in common, to enforce the contract against a purchaser who refuses to receive them, is denied on the ground that he cannot give a good title. (Ky.) 416.

Easement.

An easement in an alley across the rear end of an adjacent lot is held to be created as incident or appurtenant to a building sold by the common owner, when the alley furnishes access to a cellar under the building, as well as light and air for the rear portion of it. (Ky.) 417.

License.

A license to lay a tile drain under one's land is held to be revocable at the pleasure of the licensor, and an irrevocable right to maintain such a drain is declared to be an easement which cannot be conferred except by an instrument in writing. (W. Va.) 497.

Carrier's lien.

The lien of a carrier is held not to be defeated by delivery of the goods to an assignee for the benefit of creditors of the owner of the goods, but the carrier is held entitled to be paid out of its proceeds. (Ky.) 251.

Innkeeper's lien.

An innkeeper's lien upon property of a third person brought to the inn by a guest is denied where the statute gives a lien on property of guests, and provides that effects "belonging to" any person who departs without paying his bill may be sold to satisfy it. (S. D.) 610.

Mechanic's lien.

Giving a lien to subcontractors or materialmen without regard to any notice to the owner of the claims or to the state of the account between him and the contractor is held constitutional. (Ky.) 255.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.

Appeal.

The adoption of a constitution giving the supreme court jurisdiction on appeal to determine questions of fact as well as of law is held to operate upon appeals then pending, and to require a case to be remanded for 49 L. R. A.

the purpose of presenting the facts, where the record did not show sufficient for the purpose. (La.) 272.

Absence of judge.

The absence of a judge from the courtroom while the trial is in progress is held not to constitute a prejudicial error, where the evidence demanded the verdict rendered, and there was no request to suspend the trial on account of the judge's absence, or any objection to it, or any motion for a mistrial based upon it. (Ga.) 176.

Jurors.

The fact that a man is an Odd Fellow is held not to disqualify him as a juror in an action by an Odd Fellow of another lodge. (Mich.) 423.

Damages.

Damages for personal injuries in a railroad collision are held to include the effects of a nervous shock. (C. C. A. 9th C.) 77.

Substantial damages for an instantaneous death caused by wrongful act are held to be recoverable under a statute providing for the survival of all causes of action for injuries to the person of a decedent, whether they do or do not, instantaneously or otherwise, result in death. (Conn.) 404.

Supplemental complaint.

A supplemental complaint alleging recovery of judgment in another state on the cause of action is held to be improper, since such judgment is a bar to the further prosecution of the action. (N. D.) 285.

Evidence.

Evidence of an admission by a person who was injured, that it was due to an accident, and not to the negligence of a railroad company, is held admissible against his widow in an action by her against the railroad company, charging it with negligently causing his death. (Ga.) 175.

Presumption.

A presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company is held to arise from the fact that sparks from a passing locomotive have kindled a fire and destroyed adjacent property. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 542. Contra (C. C. A. 6th C.) 645.

Judgment against dead person.

A judgment for money, and also for foreclosure, is held impeachable collaterally, when rendered against a dead person, although death occurred after service of process. (Kan.) 153.

Removal of causes.

A proceeding for the probate of a will is held not to be removable either from the probate court or from a circuit court on appeal into a Federal court, as it is not deemed a suit of a civil nature at common law or in equity. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 62.

Injunction.

Letters or notices sent out by the owner of a patent for the purpose of destroying the business of another by threatening suits for infringement, when not done in good faith but in bad faith and solely for the purpose of destroying the other's business, are held to be a fraudulent attack upon property rights against which a court of chancery should not refuse protection. (C. C. A. 3d C.) 755.

Garnishment.

A balance remaining in the hands of the clerk of the court after payment of an execution out of the proceeds of a sale of perishable property that had been attached is held not to be subject to garnishment by a creditor of the defendant. (R. I.) 351.

Partition.

Partition of oil and gas in land, the owners of which do not own the surface of the land, is held to be impossible to make by allotting sections of the territory below the surface; and it is held that the only division that can be made is a division of the proceeds. (W. Va.) 464.

Mandamus.

Mandamus to compel a street-railway company to perform the conditions on which it accepted the privilege of operating its road in the streets is held to be proper on the ground that the duty to be performed is to the public, and is not the performance of a mere private contract. (Ill.) 650.

Set-off.

One who has recovered a judgment for damages on account of the breach of a contract, and is afterwards sued by an assignee of the other party, who has become insolvent, for the price of the goods covered by the contract, is held, to be entitled to set off against such assignee his original claim for damages, as to which the assignee was in privity, although he could not set off the judgment against him because of a lack of privity. The doctrine of merger is denied application to defeat this right. (Mich.) 311.

Computation of time.

The allowance of time "until" a certain day by order of court is held to include that day. (Wyo.) 201.

Ninety full days are held to be meant after the adjournment of the legislature before a statute will take effect, where it provides that it shall not go into force "until ninety days after adjournment." (Tex.) 193.

The day on which a bill is presented to the governor is held not to be included in the computation of the five days within which he is required to act upon a bill presented to him. (La.) 218.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

A statute making it unlawful to publish or sell papers, books, or magazines devoted to the publication of criminal news, police reports, and pictures or stories of crime, is held valid as against a publication in which such immoralities are massed, and which is mainly devoted to such matters. (Conn.) 542.

An ordinance making it unlawful for any person, except the husband, father, brother, or other male relative of a prostitute, to associate or speak with her on any street in the city, either by day or by night, is held to be invalid. (Ky.) 114.

Self crimination.

Refusing to uphold the constitutional right of a witness who refused to answer incriminating questions is held to make his punishment for contempt void for excess of the jurisdiction of the court, on account of which he may be released by habeas corpus. (Wyo.) 831.

Appeal by state.

An appeal by the state in a criminal case from a general verdict of not guilty which was entered upon motion of defendant because the warrant was issued without any affidavit is held not to be authorized by a statute providing for an appeal by the state from the quashing of an indictment, where no motion to quash was made, and the court

Jeopardy.

A defendant in a criminal case who has not been arraigned or waived arraignment and pleaded not guilty or had such plea entered for him is deemed not to have been in jeopardy. (Kan.) 186.

Pardon.

Statutory limitations on the pardoning power of the executive are held to be invalid on the ground that the pardoning power is exclusive of the legislative or judicial authority. (Okla.) 440.

ACTION OR SUIT.

Action; against Water Company for Nonsupply for Fire Purposes, see WATERS.

By Receiver, see RECEIVERS, 2-7.

1. A decree of the judge of probate is not necessary to a suit on an executor's bond for a sum which is admitted to be due. Judge of Probate v. Sulloway (N. H.) 347

2. Return of the property is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action against promoters for secret profits in the sale of the property to the corporation in fraud of the rights of future stockholders, if the property is no longer in the condition in which it was when the corporation took it, or it did not originally belong to the promoters, but to strangers. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

3. An action for damages for conspiracy is not within the provision of Wis. Rev. Stat. § 4222, subd. 5, requiring notice within one year after the event as a condition of an action for injury to the person. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

4. Failure to object to the maintenance of an action without having given the notice required by Wis. Rev. Stat. § 4222, subd. 5, to be given within one year after the injury, except by objection to evidence on the trial, is a waiver of the failure to give the notice, as the statute does not make this a condition of the right, but only a limitation on the remedy. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

5. A prohibition against suits at law on policies of insurance by an association to its members, who were jointly, and not severally, liable thereon, is merely declaratory of the law itself. Perry v. Cobb (Me.) 389

6. A rule in the relief department of a railroad company that the decision of an advisory committee on appeal from the determination of the superintendent of claims of beneficiaries submitted to him shall be final 49 L. R. A.

and conclusive on all parties without exception or appeal does not prevent the maintenance of an action on a valid claim rejected by such committee. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Stankard (Ohio) 381

7. One who has the equitable and beneficial interest in a sum due, while another has the legal interest, may by an amendment be named as the party in interest and an execution issued for her use, under N. H. Pub. Stat. chap. 199, §§ 5-8. Judge of Probate v. Sulloway (N. H.) 347

8. An action upon notes on which, after its commencement, a judgment is recovered in another state, is barred thereby, and cannot be continued on a supplemental complaint stating the fact of such judgment. Swedish American Nat. Bank v. Dickinson Co. (N. D.) 285

ADMIRALTY.

1. By the general maritime law as administered by the admiralty courts, no recovery can be had for a death by wrongful act. Rundell v. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (C. C. App. 7th C.) 92

2. A United States admiralty court will not enforce the local law of another country, in an action for negligent homicide occurring on the high seas, but such action must be governed by the general admiralty law, although the negligence occurred upon a vessel under the flag of such country. Rundell v. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (C. C. App. 7th C.) 92

APPEAL AND ERROR.Time to File Bill of Exceptions, see TIME, 2.Damages Not Grossly Excessive, see DAMAGES, 1.

1. Appeals pending in the Louisiana court of appeals when the Constitution of 1898 went into effect were entitled to consideration thereafter under the provisions of the new Constitution. Cassard v. Tracy (La.) 272

2. On an appeal which could have been heard upon questions of law alone under the Constitution in force when the appeal was taken, but which could have been heard upon both the law and the facts if taken after the adoption of La. Const. 1898, which went into effect while the appeal was pending, but in which the evidence has not been brought up and no statement of facts can be agreed upon, the case must be remanded in order that on a second trial the testimony may be reduced to writing; and on a second appeal the court can discharge its constitutional duty of adjudging the facts as well as the law of the case. Cassard v. Tracy (La.) 272

3. The abatement of a divorce proceeding by the death of appellant pending an appeal terminates the power of the court over costs, under a statute making costs dependent upon a judicial determination of the action. Begbie v. Begbie (Cal.) 141

4. The successor of a trial judge who presided in a case, overruled a motion for a new trial, and granted time in which to present a bill of exceptions, may, on the latter's death before presenting the bill, make the order for its allowance in open court, where the statute provides that it shall be allowed 49 L. R. A.

by the court if presented in open court, but specifies that it shall be done by the judge of the court before whom the cause was tried if presented in vacation. Conway v. Smith Mercantile Co. (Wyo.) 201

5. The right of the state to appeal "upon a question reserved by the state" in a criminal case includes a case in which a person who has not actually been previously in jeopardy is discharged by the court on a plea of such jeopardy. State v. Rook (Kan.) 186

6. An appeal by the state in a criminal case from a general verdict of not guilty, which was entered upon motion of defendant because the warrant was issued without any affidavit, will not be granted upon the theory that the verdict is equivalent to quashing the indictment, so that the state can appeal under N. C. Code, § 1237, where no motion to quash was made, and the court refused to withdraw a juror and dismiss the action. State v. Savery (N. C.) 585

Objections and exceptions.

7. Objections that testimony is incompetent and immaterial will not justify reversal on the ground that the plea was not sufficiently definite to warrant its admission. Bacon v. Reich (Mich.) 311

8. Exceptions by appellee to rulings of the trial court under which its liability for wrongful death was established cannot be considered by the appellate court upon reversal on appeal as to measure of damages, where the statute requires consideration of appellee's exceptions only where the questions could arise on a new trial. Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (Conn.) 404

Questions not raised below.

9. A defendant which has defended an action on the theory that it charged negligence cannot for the first time on appeal raise the question of variance on the ground that the complaint charged it with wilful wrong. Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (Conn.) 404

Review of verdict or findings.

10. A ruling of the trial court upon the weight of evidence is not subject to review. Utley v. Hill (Mo.) 323

11. A party is not entitled to have a finding of facts corrected where they are not admitted or undisputed, and the facts found are not without evidence to support them, while the record is not shown to embrace all the evidence adduced with reference to them. Hygeia Distilled Water Co. v. Hygeia Ice Co. (Conn.) 147

12. A conditional assessment by the trial court of substantial damages for death by wrongful act in case such damages may properly be awarded, together with an actual assessment of nominal damages only, is not conclusive in case the appellate court holds the actual assessment erroneous, since the finding was, in the view of the trial court, upon an immaterial fact. Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (Conn.) 404

13. An appellate court draws conclusions of law from a special verdict, but does not draw conclusions of fact from evidence. Behring v. Somerville (N. J. Err. & App.) 578

Prejudicial error.

14. Error without prejudice is no ground for reversal. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

15. Refusal to permit the filing of additional defenses to certain counts in the declaration is not error when the counts are treated as out of the case. Hygeia Distilled Water Co. v. Hygeia Ice Co. (Conn.) 147

16. It is error not to submit to the jury facts fairly in the case. J. Thompson Mfg. Co. v. Gunderson (Wis.) 859

17. Misuse of a paper admitted in evidence by counsel in argument wrongfully construing it as an admission of defendant's liability is not reversible error, if the judge cautioned the jury not to put that interpretation on it. Shaw v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (Mich.) 308

18. The absence of the judge from a courtroom while the trial is in progress, for a brief space of time, will not be ground for reversal of the judgment, where the evidence demanded the verdict rendered, and his absence was known to counsel, who made no objection and no request to suspend the trial, and no motion for a mistrial upon the judge's return. Horne v. Rodgers (Ga.) 176

1. Rules enacted by a voluntary association for the government of its members must be conformed to by it in all matters relating to it in disciplining them. Green v. Chicago Bd. of Trade (Ill.) 365

2. The rules by which the members of an association agree to be governed constitute the charter of their rights, and the courts will decline to take cognizance of any matter arising under them in respect of matters of policy or the internal economy of the organization. Lawson v. Hewell (Cal.) 400

3. Any change or amendment of the rules of a voluntary fraternal organization, if adopted in accordance with the mode provided by the association therefor, is binding upon each of the members. Lawson v. Hewell (Cal.) 400

4. The contractual relation between an association and one of its members is that which exists by virtue of the rules of the association, and the contract is not violated so long as the association acts towards him in accordance with those rules. Lawson v. Hewell (Cal.) 400

5. Individuals who associate themselves in a voluntary fraternal organization may prescribe conditions upon which membership in the association may be acquired or upon which it may continue, and may also prescribe rules of conduct for themselves during their membership, with penalties for their violation, and the tribunal and mode in which the offenses shall be determined and the penalty enforced. Lawson v. Hewell (Cal.) 400

6. The by-laws to which a member of a voluntary association agrees to submit are such as are authorized by the nature of the association and the laws of the country, and must not be contrary to the policy of the law, or unreasonable. Green v. Chicago Bd. of Trade (Ill.) 365

7. A by-law of a board of trade is not made unreasonable or against public policy by the fact that it deprives members on trial before the directors for violation of its rules, of the aid of professional counsel. Green v. Chicago Bd. of Trade (Ill.) 365

8. A by-law of a board of trade is not unreasonable or in contravention of public policy, which provides a committee of the directors to investigate charges of grave offenses or dishonesty against a member, to determine whether or not formal charges shall be preferred against him, although the investigation is to be made without his knowledge, and the charges, if preferred, are to be tried by the directors. Green v. Chicago Bd. of Trade (Ill.) 365

9. A by-law of a liverymen's association which binds the members not to do business with any person who does not patronize its members exclusively, and prevents any of them from letting a hearse to a private party for a funeral where the undertaker in charge of it is reputed to patronize nonunion members, or to any person whose family for the occasion patronizes a nonunion livery,—is unlawful as against public policy. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

10. The interest of a member in the property of an association, when merely incidental to his membership, will not prevent his expulsion if his right of membership has been forfeited; nor will it give the courts any right to prevent the investigation of the charge against him, or to determine its sufficiency. Lawson v. Hewell (Cal.) 400

11. The existence of contracts on the part of customers for the future purchase or sale of commodities at a stock exchange does not prevent the trial of the member through whom the contracts were made for violation of the rules of the exchange, although the result may be to expel him and prevent the customers from carrying out their contracts as made, since they must be presumed to have dealt with him with reference to the rules, which provide for his suspension or expulsion for misconduct. Green v. Chicago Bd. of Trade (Ill.) 365

12. The directors of a voluntary association are not deprived of jurisdiction to try a member of the association by the fact that the charges are preferred by some of their number. Green v. Chicago Bd. of Trade (Ill.) 365

13. Denial of guilt does not affect the right of a voluntary association to proceed to try one of its members for an alleged offense which is clearly in violation of its by-laws. Green v. Chicago Bd. of Trade (Ill.) 365

14. A decision by an association of persons jointly liable on a policy of insurance to one of its members, which provides that the association shall finally determine the amount due on any loss, although not strictly an award, but subject to the power of equity to give relief against it, will be binding on the member except for cause shown to the contrary. Perry v. Cobb (Me.) 389

15. A member of a voluntary association is responsible for the acts of its officers in placing the name of another member on the black list, as provided by the by-laws of the association, when he sent them the name for that purpose. Weston v. Barnicoat (Mass.) 612

ASSUMPSIT.

1. An action for money had and received will not lie against a municipality in favor of a bona fide purchaser of its bonds issued without authority to a railroad corporation of another state, in payment of a stock subscription which it had no power to make, although the proceeds of the bonds were used in constructing tracks and depot in the municipality, and it has received the stock certificates, while it might have issued such bonds to a domestic corporation in payment of a subscription to stock. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Johnson City (C. C. App. 6th C.) 123

2. An assignee of a mortgage holding it as collateral security, who receives payment of his debt from the mortgagor, and thereupon surrenders the mortgage and joins with the mortgages in directing a cancellation of the mortgage on the record, which is effected, while both he and the mortgagor are ignorant of the fact that there is a prior assignment of the mortgage, duly recorded, cannot be compelled to repay to the mortgagor the amount received from him without being restored to his former position, although the mortgagor is compelled to pay a second time to the first assignee. *Behring v. 1. An attachment suit may be amended so as to embrace the same cause of action against persons who have intervened to claim the property as was set up against the original defendant. Finch v. Gregg (N. C.) 679

2. Subsequent consignments covered by bills of lading with draft attached, which had been assigned to the same person as a former one, the draft against which was paid, are subject to attachment in his hands for loss because of failure of the former consignment to comply with the contract. Finch v. Gregg (N. C.) 679

ATTORNEYS' FEES.

A provision in a trust deed for attorneys' fees in case the property is sold under the deed is void as contrary to public policy. Turner v. Boger (N. C.) 590

AUDITOR.

A county auditor receiving a letter of instructions from the auditor of state, which commands the performance of a number of acts, some of which are proper and others not, is bound to follow the former, but may disregard the latter. State ex rel. Guilbert v. Halliday (Ohio) 427

BAILEMENT.

The negligence of a gratuitous bailee of a mule while using the animal for the very purpose for which it was loaned is imputable to the owner, so as to prevent recovery against a third person whose negligence, combined with that of the bailee, caused the mule's death. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Sims (Miss.) 322

See also EVIDENCE, 9.

1. The liability of bank directors and officers under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2760, for deposits accepted with the directors' assent after they have knowledge that the bank is insolvent or in failing circumstances, does not extend to deposits received when they did not have actual knowledge of the bank's condition, but acted in good faith and were innocent of wrongdoing, although they were negligently ignorant of the bank's condition, which they could have ascertained if they had not neglected to investigate or keep posted as to its affairs. Utlely v. Hill (Mo.) 323

2. False statements in a report which a banking corporation is required to make to the secretary of state by Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2752, making it a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment for the directors to refuse to make the statement, or wilfully and corruptly to make a false statement, will not make the directors liable to a common-law action for deceit by one who makes a deposit in the bank, relying on such report, if they make the statements in good faith, honestly believing them to be true. Utlely v. Hill (Mo.) 323

Insolvency.

3. Payment by an insolvent bank of a check of a company in which the president of the bank held most of the stock, and of a note on which its directors are indorsers, although it has not committed the formal act of insolvency, will be held to be unlawful preference, whether the estate be administered in equity or under the insolvent law, and will be set aside in an action by receivers appointed under Md. Code Gen. Pub. Laws, art. 23, relating to the dissolution of insolvent corporations, art. 47, § 22, of which prohibits preferences made when insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency. *James Clark Co. v. BILLS AND NOTES.

1. A bank does not become a purchaser of negotiable paper by discounting it for one not its debtor at the time, and placing the amount to the credit of the holder by way of deposit. Warman v. First Nat. Bank (Ill.) 412

2. The maker of a note cannot show that a bank which discounted it did not become its purchaser merely by showing that the proceeds were placed to the credit of the transferor, but must prove by the state of accounts between the bank and the transferor that it was not such, or had not, by the drawing of the deposit, become such, as to make the bank a purchaser. Warman v. First Nat. Bank (Ill.) 412

3. Mere negligence in making inquiries as to the validity of negotiable paper before purchasing does not charge one with notice of infirmities. Central State Bank v. Spurlin (Iowa) 661

Negotiability.

4. A stipulation in an instrument for the payment of a certain sum of money, payable with current exchange on a place other than the place of payment, is not destructive of negotiability. Clark v. Skeen (Kan.) 190

5. A note for the payment of a certain sum at a fixed date is not rendered non-negotiable by a stipulation that upon default in the payment of interest the whole amount shall become due, at the option of the holder, and then draw a greater rate of interest. Clark v. Skeen (Kan.) 190

6. The addition of the word "trustee" to the name of the payee of a note does not destroy its negotiability. Central State Bank v. Spurlin (Iowa) 661

Defense.

7. One who, at the request of the principal debtor, places his name as surety on a note after the signatures of several makers, guarantees the genuineness of such signatures to an innocent payee, and cannot be released from liability on the ground that one signature is a forgery. Wheeler v. Traders' Deposit Bank (Ky.) 315

8. The failure of a vendee under a bond for title, to obtain possession of the premises, is no defense to a suit on a note given for the purchase price, where it appears that he not only never desired possession, but also that he could have obtained possession at any time on demand. Horne v. Rodgers (Ga.) 176

9. One who bought land, paid a part of the purchase money, gave a promissory note for the balance, and took a bond for titles with knowledge of an existing encumbrance on the property, and who subsequently entered into an agreement with the vendor recognizing liability on the note and, in effect, the promise to pay therein contained, upon the vendor's removing the encumbrance, could not defeat a recovery upon the note by the vendor when it affirmatively appeared that the latter had complied with the terms of the agreement, and could, and would, on the payment of the note, have made the vendee a good title. Horne v. Rodgers (Ga.) 176

1. A municipal corporation which has certified on the face of its bonds that they were issued for funding floating indebtedness—a lawful purpose—cannot repudiate them after they have reached the hands of bona fide holders, on the ground that the proceeds were actually intended and used to take up invalid warrants. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

2. A municipal corporation is estopped from controverting statements made upon the face of its bonds as to the purpose for which they were issued, so as to invalidate them in the hands of bona fide purchasers. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

3. Recitals by municipal officers who are invested with authority to perform a precedent condition to the issue of negotiable bonds, or with authority to determine when that condition has been performed, that the bonds have been issued "in pursuance of," or "in conformity with," or "by virtue of," or "by authority of," the statute, will preclude inquiry, as against an innocent purchaser for value, as to whether or not the precedent conditions had been performed before the bonds were issued. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

4. Power to borrow money and issue bonds for all municipal purposes includes the power to do so to pay or refund indebtedness of the municipality. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

5. Unlimited power to issue bonds, granted to a municipal corporation by special charter, is not revoked by a general law giving such corporations power to issue bonds for specified purposes, where a proviso to the general law expressly provides that it shall not be construed to limit the powers theretofore conferred by any special charter. *Huron v. 1. A railroad company must not permit the continuance of dangerous habits of a mail agent in delivering heavy packages from the car in such manner as to endanger persons lawfully on its premises. Shaw v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (Mich.) 308

2. Continuance, for a considerable length of time, of a practice by mail agents to deliver mail bags from the car in such a manner as to endanger persons on the premises, will charge the carrier with notice. Shaw v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (Mich.) 308

Of passengers.

3. The law implies a contract on the part of a parent who enters a railroad train with a child non sui juris and subject to payment of fare, to pay the fare of such child. Braun v. Northern P. R. Co. (Minn.) 319

4. A parent who refuses to pay the fare of a child in his custody who is subject to the payment of fare may be ejected from the train with the child, though the parent tenders payment of his own fare. Braun v. Northern P. R. Co. (Minn.) 319

5. The fare paid by a parent who refuses to pay the fare rightfully demanded for a child in his custody must be returned or tendered to the parent, or such part thereof as may be unearned, before the child can lawfully be ejected from the train, since the forcible ejection and removal of the child for nonpayment of fare is in effect the ejection and removal of the parent. Braun v. Northern P. R. Co. (Minn.) 319

6. A rule of a street-railway company requiring passengers to buy tickets and board the cars within the station, and compelling one who boards a car without the station to pay fare, even though he has previously paid a fare within the station, is a reasonable regulation for facilitating the transfer of passengers and the dispatch of cars; but it must be enforced in a reasonable manner. Nashville Street R. Co. v. Griffin (Tenn.) 451

7. The ejection for refusal to pay a second fare, of a passenger who, after paying fare within a station, has boarded a car that has left the station and is standing a few feet outside of it, and who would otherwise have to wait twenty minutes for another car, is an unreasonable and arbitrary enforcement of a rule of the company requiring passengers to board the cars within the station or pay another fare if they board them beyond the station limits, and will subject the company to liability for injuries sustained in consequence of the ejection, where the conductor knows that he has already paid fare at the station. Nashville Street R. Co. v. Griffin (Tenn.) 451

8. The mere starting of a car upon its journey, by the conductor, with knowledge that a person has boarded the car without the station, after paying fare within the station, is not an acceptance of such person as a passenger, or a waiver of a rule of the street-railway company requiring passengers to pay fare and board cars within the station, and compelling one who has boarded a car without the station to pay a fare, although he has already paid his fare on entering the station. Nashville Street R. Co. v. Griffin (Tenn.) 451

9. A sale of round-trip excursion tickets at reduced rates is itself sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry and affect him with notice of unusual terms and conditions attached to the use of such ticket. Watson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Tenn.) 454

10. A condition printed on the return part of a round-trip excursion ticket, "Not good for passage unless stamped by joint agent at" the place of departure, is a reasonable regulation by the carrier. Watson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Tenn.) 454

11. That the purchaser of a round-trip excursion ticket is unable to read or write, and is not specially notified of the requirements and conditions upon which the tickets are sold, does not relieve him from the necessity of complying with a condition printed on the return portion of the ticket, requiring it to be stamped by the agent of the company on the day of departure. Watson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Tenn.) 454

12. The fact that other passengers are allowed to travel upon round-trip excursion tickets without having them stamped as required by a rule of the company does not abrogate the rule, or relieve a purchaser of such a ticket from the duty to comply with the condition, unless such violations of the rule are so frequent as to amount to a custom and to mislead the purchaser. Watson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Tenn.) 454

13. A passenger alighting from a train at a place where he must cross a track to reach the public highway may, in the absence of warning, presume that trains will not be so operated as to impose on him the same degree of care which he would be obliged to exercise if he were not a passenger. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. King (C. C. App. 6th C.) 102

14. If a passenger alights by direction or implied invitation of the carrier at a place where, in order to leave the carrier's premises, it is necessary to cross the carrier's track, there is an implied agreement that in using that mode of egress trains will not be so operated as to make the exit unnecessarily dangerous. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. King (C. C. App. 6th C.) 102

15. A street-car passenger who was injured after leaving the car and while attempting to pass behind the car in the dark, by falling over a fender which had become disarranged without the knowledge of the company, and was projecting from the rear of the car, cannot hold the street-railway company liable for the injury. Gargan v. West End Street R. Co. (Mass.) 421

16. A carrier is not liable for the death of a passenger who was sick, but supposed to be under the influence of liquor, and who was helped from the car at the terminus of the route, and led by the conductor to the front of the station, at or near the public street, where the way was open in the direction that the passenger wished to go, but who, after the conductor had started on his outward trip, turned and went towards the back of the station, and subsequently slipped down between the wheels of a moving car. Bageard v. Consolidated Traction Co. (N. J. Err & App.) 424

17. A railroad company is liable to a passenger for injuries caused by a collision on account of the negligence of the agents of a receiver who were jointly using the track under a lease. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller (C. C. App. 9th C.) 77

18. A passenger escaped from a wrecked and burning car is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to close her ears and shut her eyes as to everything that transpires resulting from the collision, while remaining for about thirty minutes upon an embankment to which she has climbed out of a deep trench, although the horrors incident to the collision may thus increase the fright or nervous shock which she sustains. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller (C. C. App. 9th C.) 77

19. The loss of perishable freight on account of lack of proper refrigeration, when shipped in refrigerator cars, renders the railroad company liable to the shipper, although the cars were leased by the railroad company from a transportation company which agreed to keep them properly refrigerated. New York, P. & N. R. Co. v. Cromwell (Va.) 462

20. A carrier refusing to accept freight tendered may be held liable for its loss by theft before the owner has opportunity, after notice of refusal, to make some safer disposition of it than to leave it in the warehouse at the wharf. Seasongood, S., K. & Co. v. Tennessee & O. R. Transp. Co. (Ky.) 270

21. An agreement between rival carriers, that each will accept only freight destined to points within certain specified limits, will not absolve one from liability to shippers for refusal to accept freight destined for points within another's territory. Seasongood, S., K. & Co. v. Tennessee & O. R. Transp. Co. (Ky.) 270

22. That freight is destined to a point beyond its line will not authorize a carrier to refuse to accept it when tendered to it for transportation. Seasongood, S., K. & Co. v. Tennessee & O. R. Transp. Co. (Ky.) 270

23. A carrier which knowingly permits one to act as its agent in such manner and for such length of time as to induce a person of ordinary prudence to believe that such assumed agent is in fact a general agent will be bound by his acts within the apparent scope of his authority. Seasongood, S., K. & Co. v. Tennessee & O. R. Transp. Co. (Ky.) 270

Liens.

24. The lien of a common carrier for his charges upon property carried is not defeated by an assignment made for the benefit of creditors by the owner of the property shipped. Caye v. Fabel (Ky.) 251

25. A delivery by a common carrier, to an assignee for creditors, of property subject to the carrier's lien, is for the benefit of all creditors, including the carrier, according to their respective interests, and does not defeat the carrier's right to be paid out of the proceeds of the property. Caye v. Fabel (Ky.) 251

26. A fund arising from the collection, by an assignee for creditors, of money on a contract, in the performance of which property subject to a carrier's lien has been used, is chargeable with such lien. Caye v. Fabel (Ky.) 251

Limiting liability.

27. The prohibition against contracts by common carriers for relief against their common-law liability, which is contained in Ky. Const. § 196, does not make it unlawful for a railroad corporation created by the authorities of that state to make a contract in another state limiting its liability for a transportation of goods between points in other states, and which is to be performed entirely outside of the state of Kentucky. *Tecumseh Mills v. 1. In all cases where a court is called upon to give effect to a right dependent upon a foreign statute, it involves the enforcement of foreign law, and its action in that regard depends upon the rule of comity. Finney v. Guy (Wis.) 486

2. A statute of a state in which a railroad employee is injured, providing that proof of a defect in an appliance shall be presumptive evidence of knowledge thereof on the part of a railroad company, does not govern in an action brought for the injury in another state. Jones v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (Minn.) 640

3. The law of the place where the death occurred, and not where the accident happened, governs in an action for death by wrongful act. Rundell v. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (C. C. App. 7th C.) 92

4. To make the law of a flag under which a ship was sailing applicable to an action for death of a passenger by drowning while upon the high seas, the drowning must be shown to have been upon the vessel. Rundell v. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (C. C. App. 7th C.) 92

5. Policies of insurance made and executed in New York, reciting that they are payable there, and that premiums are to be paid there, and containing a waiver of the service of notices required by statute, which reference is to a New York statute, are to be governed by the laws of that state, where the applications therefor recite that they are subject to the laws of New York, although they are made in another state where the applicant resides and where the policies are delivered to him by an agent of the insurer upon payment of premiums. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Dingley (C. C. App. 9th C.) 132

6. The liability imposed by statute upon stockholders for debts of the corporation is contractual as well as statutory, and may be enforced in foreign jurisdiction, if the statute requires no preliminary local proceedings to adjust equities. Howarth v. Lombard (Mass.) 301

7. No action will lie in courts out of the state to enforce liability of stockholders for corporate debts, where the statutes imposing such liability provide a single method of enforcing it by one suit in the state courts in favor of all creditors and against the corporation, if it has assets, and all stockholders. Finney v. Guy (Wis.) 486

8. Collection may be made from stockholders wherever they may be found, after the preliminary proceedings required by statute, and the adjustment of the rights and liabilities of the corporation, creditors, and stockholders, under a statute imposing liability for corporate debts upon stockholders after proceedings showing the insolvency of the corporation and the need of payment by stockholders to satisfy the claims of creditors. Howarth v. Lombard (Mass.) 301

3. An unconstitutional discrimination is made by the law which permits the use of the national flag for public or private exhibitions of art, but forbids its use, under penalty, for advertising purposes generally. Ruhrstrat v. People (Ill.) 181

4. Discrimination in favor of the graduates of a regular college of dentistry, in a statute requiring graduates of other universities or colleges authorized to grant diplomas in dental surgery to be examined with reference to qualifications, is not an arbitrary and unconstitutional discrimination in violation of U. 6. The lien given to a subcontractor, materialman, or laborer by Ky. act March 1896 (Ky. Stat. § 2463), though given irrespective of any notice of the claim or of the state of the account between the owners and the contractors, is not unconstitutional, as to future contracts, as a taking of one man's property to pay the debt of another without giving any day in court, or as an unwarrantable interference with the right to make contracts. Hightower v. Bailey (Ky.) 255

vision may be made by general laws under the amendment of N. Y. Const. art. 1, § 7, adopted in 1894, is a taking of private property for a private use, in violation of U. S. 1. The right of drainage through the lands of another is an easement requiring for its enjoyment an interest in such lands, which cannot be conferred except by deed or conveyance in writing. Pifer v. Brown (W. Va.) 497

2. Full performance of the consideration of a contract for real estate, by caring for and supporting the owner until death and then providing for her burial, is sufficient to take the contract out of the statute of frauds, even as to a piece of real estate included in the property of which actual possession has not been taken under the contract, where there is no evidence that anyone else had or claimed possession of it, and there is evidence that the owner had surrendered entire possession of the property, including herself, to the other party to the contract. Bryson v. McShane (W. Va.) 527

3. A signature to an agreement by a president of a corporation who is also the general manager may be sufficient when he signs as president without signing also as manager. Wells, F. & Co. v. Enright (Cal.) 647

4. An agreement on behalf of a bank, executed by the president and manager, with the approval of its vice president, to waive a defense under the statute of limitations, may be sufficient to bind the bank, although it was not ratified by the directors and they were not aware of its execution, where the entire management of the business was left to the president and vice president, and they were not accustomed to report their actions to the directors, or to ask a ratification thereof, or to first obtain special authority before performing particular acts, while a by-law of the bank provided that the manager should have power to perform all duties which the interests of the bank might require. Wells, F. & Co. v. Enright (Cal.) 647

5. A contract by sellers of ice to purchase from another all the ice necessary to carry on their business for a period of five years is not void for uncertainty, and their liability under it cannot be avoided by the transfer of their business within that period, so that they need no more ice under the contract. Hickey v. O'Brien (Mich.) 594

6. If machines manufactured under a contract depart from the specifications, with the knowledge and consent of the purchaser, he cannot hold the manufacturer responsible in damages for their failure to work. J. Thompson Mfg. Co. v. Gunderson (Wis.) 859

7. Departure from specifications in machines manufactured under a contract will be waived by taking them and failing to give timely notice of nonacceptance because of noncompliance with the contract. J. Thompson Mfg. Co. v. Gunderson (Wis.) 859

8. Recovery for the work done in the partial performance of a contract to move a building may be had where it was entirely consumed by fire after the contract was partly performed. Angus v. Scully (Mass.) 562

Consideration.

9. Ample consideration is furnished for contract obligations of a street-railway company to perform the conditions of a contract with a city, by the grant of the privilege of using the streets for an electric railway. People ex rel. Jackson v. Suburban R. Co. (Ill.) 650

10. Forbearance to bring suit on a claim is a sufficient consideration for an agreement not to plead the statute of limitations thereto. Wells, F. & Co. v. Enright (Cal.) 647

11. The death of a stallion, preventing an exercise of the privilege of return by one who had paid for a fruitless service, with an agreement for the privilege of return during the season, does not create any failure of consideration which will give a right to repayment. Pinkham v. Libby (Me.) 693

Validity.

12. An agreement not to plead the statute of limitations is not void as against public policy. Wells, F. & Co. v. Enright (Cal.) 647

13. Public policy will not avoid a contract by a municipality to pay for a reasonable length of time a portion of the taxes assessed against a water company, as part consideration for a water supply, merely because the gross and annual amounts to be paid are uncertain and the return to be received is also uncertain, where the contract is limited to the taxes assessed on the property owned by the company at the time of its execution, and on pipe lines, hydrants, and fixtures thereafter laid. *Maine Water Co. v. 4. A stockholder of a corporation is liable for interest on obligations which bear interest, under a statute making him liable for his proportion of the debts of the corporation. Wells, F. & Co. v. Enright (Cal.) 647

5. A set-off by a stockholder, of a debt due him from the corporation, cannot be made in an action against him by a creditor of the corporation under S. C. Rev. Stat. 1893, § 1500, providing that the stockholders shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors of the corporation in an amount not exceeding 5 per cent of their stock, in addition to their share or shares, since there is no mutuality in the claims. Lauraglen Mills v. Ruff (S. C.) 448

6. Promoters of a corporation cannot honestly take any remuneration for their services as such, unless a full statement thereof is incorporated in the prospectus, or unless it is voted to them after all the stock has been taken by the public. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

7. A vote by all the stockholders of a corporation at a time when none but promoters or their nominees are stockholders, authorizing the issuance of paid-up stock to the promoters for their services, is not sufficient to validate such issuance. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

8. It is a fraud for promoters to undertake to decide for the future stockholders in the corporation to be organized, that one third of the whole capital stock is a fair remuneration for their services, to issue that amount to themselves as such remuneration, and then to invite the public to subscribe to the stock without disclosing that fact and getting the subscribers' consent to the payment of that remuneration. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

9. Stock taken by promoters for services, in fraud of the rights of future stockholders, may be followed by the corporation, and the shares or their proceeds recovered in the promoters' hands, or damages for their loss. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

10. Expenses of organization paid by promoters may be deducted by them in accounting for stock fraudulently taken by them in payment for services as promoters. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

11. The value of stock fraudulently taken by promoters for services, for which they are required to account to the corporation, is to be fixed, not as of the time of the taking, when it had no value, but at the time when, by the launching of the corporation, its value was established. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

1. Seven thousand dollars is not so grossly excessive as to require interference by the appellate court, as damages for injuries to an intending railway passenger by a mail bag thrown through the station window, which injuries were very painful, and caused permanent disfigurement and loss of sight of one eye. Shaw v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (Mich.) 308

2. Substantial damages may be recovered for an instantaneous death caused by wrongful act, under a statute providing that all causes of action for injuries to the person of a decedent, whether the same do or do not instantaneously or otherwise result in death, shall survive to his executor or administrator. Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (Conn.) 404

3. Lost profits on the entire lot of machines cannot be recovered for failure to manufacture them according to the specifications of the contract, where one, at least, has been accepted and paid for. J. Thompson Mfg. Co. v. Gunderson (Wis.) 859

4. Injuries caused by fright or shock resulting from a bodily injury in connection with a railroad collision, the accompanying explosion, fire, and wreck of cars, and the surrounding circumstances directly connected therewith and solely attributable thereto, may be included in a recovery of the damages sustained in the accident. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller (C. C. App. 9th C.) 77

5. No damages for injury to feelings can be recovered in an action for conspiracy in pursuance of which the hearse and carriages were taken away from a funeral just at the time when they were needed, since there is no physical injury with which the injury to feelings is connected. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

6. Compelling the withdrawal of a hearse and carriages from a funeral just at the time when they were wanted, in pursuance of an unlawful by-law of a liverymen's association which prohibited doing business with any person who did not deal exclusively with its members, will justify an award of exemplary damages, where the act was done with full knowledge of the situation, and for the purpose of demonstrating the power of the association to punish liverymen for doing business in an independent way, and to punish other persons for dealing with nonunion liverymen. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

7. Punitive damages may be awarded for injuries sustained in consequence of an ejection from a street car for refusal to pay fare, where the ejection was unwarranted and arbitrary, causing serious injuries to the passenger, who shortly afterwards suffered from an attack of pneumonia, the severity of which was to some extent due to his injuries and the condition of his system in consequence thereof. Nashville Street R. Co. v. Griffin (Tenn.) 451

An ordinance making it unlawful for any person to associate, escort, converse, or loiter with any female known as a common prostitute, either by day or by night, upon any of the streets or alleys of the city, except her husband, father, brother, or other male relative, is invalid, as there can be no good reason in exempting any other male relative than the husband, father, or brother from its provisions, or for failing to give her mother and sister the same privilege allowed to the father or brother, while any person should be allowed to converse with her long enough to transact any necessary and legitimate business. The right to dower which a former wife "divorced without alimony, where she is the innocent party," is given by Conn. Gen. Stat. § 618, does not exist in favor of any former wife of a man who had another lawful wife at the time of his death, since that section gives the right first to a woman "living with her husband at the time of his death," and the provision for the divorced wife, when construed in connection with § 2803, permitting both parties to marry again, and § 630, providing for the shares of husband and wife in the distribution of intestate estates, shows the intent to give dower to the lawful wife surviving, if any, and to no one else. ELECTRICAL USES.

engaged in moving, where the awning was not used as a place of resort, and it could not reasonably have been expected that anyone would ever be upon it, and the height at which the wires were strung precluded the possibility of any traveler upon the street coming in contact with them. *Brush Electric Light & P. Rev. Stat. 1871, § 699, giving such power to corporations created for the purpose of constructing and maintaining "a magnetic telegraph line." *San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. 2. Notice from viewers in an eminent domain proceeding, and an appearance in response thereto, cannot give them any authority to assess damages for injury by negligent construction of the work, as that is not within their jurisdiction. Stork v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 600

3. Damage to a dwelling house by settling and cracking of the walls, caused by the improper manner of performing the work of constructing a subway on a street, cannot be assessed as part of the compensation given by Pa. Const. art. 16, § 8, for property "taken, injured, or destroyed" by the construction of public improvements, since those damages extend only to injuries which are the direct, immediate, and necessary or inevitable consequence of the act of eminent domain itself, irrespective of care or negligence in the doing of it. 6. The presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company is not raised, as matter of law, by mere proof that sparks from its locomotive set fire to adjacent property. Garrett v. Southern R. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 645

7. A presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company arises from the fact that sparks have issued from a passing locomotive, of such size and in such volume as to kindle a fire and destroy adjacent property. McCullen v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 642 until maturity, but usurious interest afterwards, which states that legal interest until maturity made up part of the face of the bond, and that the illegal interest was a penalty for not paying at maturity, will not be excluded from evidence for contradicting the bond. Ward v. Cornett (Va.) 550

14. An answer denying usury, directly responsive to the special interrogations of a bill of discovery in aid of an injunction suit against a sale under a deed of trust securing a bond, is to be taken as evidence in favor of defendant. Ward v. Cornett (Va.) 550

15. The possibility that a letter written after the commencement of an action may be manufactured evidence goes to its weight, not its competency. Weston v. Barnicoat (Mass.) 612

16. A letter declining to deal with one because his name is on the black list is not inadmissible in an action for placing it there, because it contained a compliment to the one to whom it was written, the plaintiff in the action. Weston v. Barnicoat (Mass.) 612

17. Letters declining to deal with one because his name is on the black list, written after the beginning of an action for damages for placing it there, are proper evidence in the action, since all damages must be included in one recovery. Weston v. Barnicoat (Mass.) 612

18. The whole paper alleged to have been sold must go to the jury in a prosecution for unlawfully selling a paper devoted to the publication of criminal news. State v. McKee (Conn.) 542

20. Expert evidence as to what appliances are safe and what are unsafe is not admissible in an action by a teamster to recover from his employer for injuries caused by short lines and absence of a wagon seat. Limberg v. Glenwood Lumber Co. (Cal.) 33

21. An opinion by a physician that the condition of a patient is the result of injury and shock of some sort is not incompetent, when it is derived from his own knowledge, attendance, treatment, and examination of the patient, though based in part upon her statements and complaints, made at different times, as to her pains and sufferings. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller (C. C. App. 9th C.) 77

Admissions.

23. An admission that an injury was caused by an accident, and not by negligence of a railroad company, made by the injured person, who subsequently dies of the injuries, may be proved on behalf of the defendant in an action by his widow against the railroad company for damages on account of his death. *Georgia R. & Bkg. 24. Evidence as to what was seen and heard after a passenger left a burning and wrecked car and climbed out of a deep trench, up a steep embankment, where she remained about thirty minutes while the cars were burning and injured persons were being brought up, is part of the res gestæ, and competent evidence on the question of fright or nervous shock sustained by the passenger. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller (C. C. App. 9th C.) 77

Relevancy.

25. Evidence assailing the integrity of legislative journals, which the Constitution requires to be kept, by showing the falsity of entries as to the presence of members when determining an election contest, is inadmissible, since the court is without jurisdiction to go behind the record made by the legislature under the Constitution. Taylor v. Beckham (Ky.) 258

26. Evidence of a certificate issued by the city clerk as to assessed valuation of the property in the city and the amount of indebtedness is not admissible in an action to enforce payment of bond coupons, where it does not appear that the holder of the bonds ever saw or relied upon it. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

27. On the trial of an issue of fact, where the bona fides of a claim is challenged, it is competent to prove that on a former trial of the same issue, in which the party whose claim is challenged testified to an entirely different state of facts, he produced, also, a witness to corroborate his statement. The evidence is not to be received as affirmative proof of what was deposed, but as discrediting such party. Bageard v. Consolidated Traction Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 424

28. Evidence of the habits or condition of defendant subsequent to the commencement of the action is admissible for the defense in an action for divorce on the ground of habitual intemperance, since a divorce concerns the state as well as the parties, and the condition justifying it must be found to exist at the very time when the divorce is granted. Allen v. Allen (Conn.) 142

29. Evidence of a railroad company's rule in relation to running switches is inadmissible in an action against the company for negligence in "kicking" a car, in the absence of evidence to show that a running switch and a kick are the same. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Fitzgerald (Ga.) 175

30. Evidence that other persons had been struck by mail thrown onto the platform is admissible in an action for injuries to an intending passenger by a mail bag going through the station window; and its admission cannot be made erroneous by merely showing on cross-examination that such accidents were at remote periods of time, but advantage of that fact must be taken by motion to strike out or to limit. Shaw v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (Mich.) 308

31. To render previous acts of a mail agent in ejecting mail from a moving train admissible in evidence in an action for injuries caused by the bag going through a window in the station building and injuring an intending passenger, it is not necessary that they show the prior occurrence of such an accident; it is sufficient if they indicate that in common prudence the carrier ought to have anticipated that such an accident was liable to happen. Shaw v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (Mich.) 308

32. Evidence that a navigation company had an agreement with contractors who were blasting near a wharf, under which it used the wharf at its own peril, is inadmissible in an action against the contractors by a person who was injured by the blasting while he was a passenger on a boat at the wharf. Smith v. Day (C. C. App. 9th C.) 108

33. Evidence that the shortness of lines was remedied after injury to the teamster, because thereof, is not admissible in an action to recover for the injury. Limberg v. Glenwood Lumber Co. (Cal.) 33

34. Evidence that land declined in value after maturity of a note given for the purchase money is immaterial in an action on the note. Horne v. Rodgers (Ga.) 170

35. Evidence that property under encumbrance is not ordinarily marketable is inadmissible for defendant in an action on a note given for purchase money with knowledge of the encumbrance. Horne v. Rodgers (Ga.) 176

36. A general denial by an insurer that the insured has performed all or any of the conditions of his contract, when coupled with a specific averment of particulars in which he has failed to perform, will not permit proof of failure in other particulars. *Mutual L. 37. Evidence in support of a plea of the statute of limitations may be given under the issue of not guilty, as a defense to an information for crime. State v. Rook (Kan.) 186

Weight; sufficiency.

38. Evidence to prove usury must be such as to establish it beyond a reasonable doubt. Ward v. Cornett (Va.) 550

39. The death of a passenger on a sleeping car is not so palpably one of suicide as to compel the jury to reach that conclusion, where he disappeared from the car during the night, and was found the next morning, with his overcoat on, on the railroad track, between the rails, face down, with head towards the direction in which the train was going, with his arms stretched above his head, and his feet between the cross ties, while there was an injury upon his skull sufficient to produce death, and a small quantity of blood on the cross ties between the rails, although there was evidence that he had, some months before, resigned his position under charges affecting his character, and some conflict in the evidence as to whether he was despondent or not, but he was in good credit, and not in danger of want. *Standard L. & A. 2. The governor has no power to adjourn the legislature, when there has been no disagreement between the two houses, under Ky. Const. § 36, providing for sessions to be held at the seat of government, "except in case of war, insurrection, or pestilence, when it may, by proclamation of the governor, assemble for the time being elsewhere," which seems to refer, not to an adjournment, but to a provision for a place to assemble and organize, and § 80, authorizing him to adjourn the legislature in case of disagreement between the two houses with respect to the matter. *Taylor v. of a patent for the purpose of destroying the business of another by threatening the latter's agents and customers with suits for infringement, when this is not done in good faith to warn against infringement, but in bad faith and solely for the purpose of destroying the business of another, is a fraudulent attack upon property rights, against which a court of chancery should not refuse protection. A. B. Farquhar Co. v. National Harrow Co. (C. C. App. 3d C.) 755

2. An injunction to restrain a chapter of Royal Arch Masons from proceeding with the trial of charges against a member cannot be granted, when the proceedings are in strict accordance with the rules of the order, on the ground of the invalidity of the rule which the member is charged with violating, because it was adopted as the result of a conspiracy in the furtherance of which the proceedings are being taken. Lawson v. Hewell (Cal.) 400

3. Payment of deposited margins in accordance with the decision of a committee of a board of trade may be prevented by injunction, when the committee practically denied a hearing to the defeated party by refusing to hear evidence which he was entitled to have considered under the rules of the board. *Ryan v. 1. Policies of insurance, like other contracts, should be reasonably construed, so as not to defeat the intention and express language of the parties. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers (Ohio) 760

2. The conditions and agreements in a policy of life insurance form the contract between the parties, and will not be varied or controlled by the subsequent course of dealing between them, in the absence of fraud or bad faith. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Buxer (Ohio) 737

3. Authority to a clerk to deliver insurance policies does not include the delivery of policies upon which the clerk has forged his principal's signature, so as to make the principal responsible for the act. Bradford v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. (C. C. App. 3d C.) 530

4. An insurance agent is not liable to the company for loss on a risk which he was forbidden to take, where the policy was issued without his knowledge, consent, or ratification, by a clerk in his office who forged his name to it, where the wrong was not committed for his purposes, and he never consented to profit by it. Bradford v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. (C. C. App. 3d C.) 530

5. Merely employing and retaining a clerk in an insurance office, without any ground for suspecting that he would abuse any confidence reposed in him, will not estop the agent from repudiating his act in forging the agent's name to a policy, where he was given no authority to sign the agent's name, and the agent had done nothing to make it appear that such authority was given him. Bradford v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. (C. C. App. 3d C.) 530.

6. An agent has no power to waive a stipulation in a policy of insurance against loss from liability for injuries to employees, providing for immediate written notice of any injury, where the policy also provides that no agent shall have authority to waive or alter anything therein contained, since the insured is bound by the terms of the policy. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers (Ohio) 760

7. The right of resort to the courts by members of a fraternal organization will not be deemed to be taken away by mere inference; and if it can be done at all it will only 49 L. R. A.

be where the restriction is stated in the clearest and most express terms. Supreme Lodge of O. of S. F. v. Raymond (Kan.) 373

8. An agreement by members of a voluntary benefit association, that the decision of its tribunals rejecting a claim to benefits shall be conclusive, is not against public policy as an attempt to oust courts of jurisdiction. Hembeau v. Great Camp of the K. of M. (Mich.) 592

9. Loss of value of a cargo due to a bad reputation on account of injury to a part of it is not within the terms of an insurance policy when the damage actually done was below the particular average or partial loss excepted. Perry v. Cobb (Me.) 389

10. Damages to a cargo of lime, caused by a shrinking of barrel staves and slacking up of the cooperage, allowing the contents to sift out, and leaving the barrels so tender that they could not easily be hoisted without danger of falling to pieces, is not caused by peril of the sea, if the protracted length of the voyage, due to rough weather, was the proximate cause of the condition of the cargo. Perry v. Cobb (Me.) 389

11. A voluntary benefit association which by the contract is given power to pass on claims is not guilty of fraud in rejecting a death claim on the ground of want of interest in the beneficiary, although at the time the beneficiary was designated the local agent assured the applicant that the beneficiary was a "dependent" within the meaning of the contract, if no oppression or bad faith in the ruling of the association is shown. Hembeau v. Great Camp of the K. of M. (Mich.) 592.

12. A condition in a life insurance policy to the effect that "in case of default for non-payment of premium after three years, and no legal surrender having been made, the insured having paid at maturity all notes given for premium, then this policy shall, without surrender, but upon payment of all outstanding premium notes, become a paid-up term policy without change of terms or conditions," requires the payment of all outstanding premium notes, though given after three annual premiums have been paid, and is a condition precedent to such policy becoming a paid-up term policy. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Buxer (Ohio) 737

13. A temporary occupation of the platform of a car by a passenger for a necessary or proper purpose is not a "riding" thereon, within the meaning of a clause in an accident policy which contains a condition against riding on a car platform. Standard L. & A. Ins. Co. v. Thornton (C. C. App. 6th C.) 116

14. The share of one of the beneficiaries of a benefit certificate who dies, leaving issue, during the life of the insured, is in the nature of a testamentary gift, and will therefore pass to such issue in accordance with the rule as to a devise or legacy declared by Ky. Stat. § 4841, providing that it shall pass to the issue of a devisee or legatee who dies during the life of testator, although a by-law of the society is to the effect that the share of a beneficiary who dies during the life of the insured shall go to the other beneficiaries pro rata, since this must be construed, in the light of the statute, to apply only when the deceased beneficiary leaves no issue. Supreme Council C. K. of A. v. Densford (Ky.) 776

Forfeiture.

15. Notice of accrual of premium, as required by N. Y. Laws 1877, chap. 321, is necessary to a forfeiture of a policy for nonpayment of premium, in the absence of which forfeiture cannot be effected by agreement of the parties. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hill (C. C. App. 9th C.) 127

16. Beneficiaries of a life insurance policy subject to the operation of the New York laws requiring notice of accrual of premium before forfeiture for nonpayment will not be bound, in the absence of such notice, by statements of the insured to the company that he cannot pay premiums, and that the company may consider the policy forfeited. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hill (C. C. App. 9th C.) 127

17. Policies issued and delivered by a New York company in another state are subject to the terms of N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 690, § 92, providing that "no life insurance company doing business in this state" shall declare a policy forfeited without having given prescribed notice. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Dingley (C. C. App. 9th C.) 132

18. Oral statements by an insured, recognizing the forfeiture of his policies, and refusing to continue them, when made without any consideration, will not be sufficient to annul the express provisions of a statute prohibiting a forfeiture for nonpayment of premiums without the giving of specified notice. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Dingley (C. C. App. 9th C.) 132

19. An insured is not entitled to a loan on his policy, under a provision therein for a loan upon it, after he is in default in the payment of a premium or premium note, where such default works a forfeiture of the policy by its terms and conditions, unless such default is waived by the company. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Buxer (Ohio) 737

20. A forfeiture clause in a premium note given by the insured, if more onerous than that in the policy as against the interests of his wife, who is the beneficiary in the policy in case of his death, will not avail the insurance company as against the wife, unless she assents thereto, where the note is given for a premium after the policy has been in force several years. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Buxer (Ohio) 737

Notice of injury.

21. Immediate notice of an injury, stipulated for in a contract of insurance against loss from liability for injuries to employees, means notice within a reasonable time. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers (Ohio) 760

22. Delay for nine months to give notice of an injury will defeat a policy of insurance against loss from liability for injuries to employees under circumstances which shall impose upon the insured a common-law or statutory liability, providing that immediate written notice shall be given of any injury, although the notice was sent as soon as a claim was made by the employee on account of the injury, since the stipulation as to notice is of the essence of the contract. NOTES AND BRIEFS.

1. The difference between the value of land at the time of the assignment of dower and homestead and at the time when those estates fall in is not an increment to the estate, within the meaning of a rule for allowance of interest on advancements up to the amount of an increment to the estate, since the additional value accrues merely by the removal of an encumbrance. Wysong v. Rambo (Tenn.) 766

2. Interest on advancements of land to some of the heirs of a person, which may be charged for the purpose of equalizing the share of another heir, should be allowed only from the death of the ancestor until the lapse of a reasonable time for the settlement of the estate, where the heir whose share is to be equalized failed to take any steps to procure the settlement for many years after the ancestor's death, and in the meantime permitted the other heirs to enjoy the possession of their lands. 2. Statements in letters written by a landlord to his tenant after the latter has abandoned the premises, to the effect that the premises will be leased at the tenant's risk, which are not replied to, will not avoid the rule that a surrender is effected by the letting with the consent of the former tenant, on the ground that by his silence the tenant acquiesced in the landlord's proposition. Gray v. Kaufman Dairy & Ice Cream Co. (N. Y.) 580

3. A constructive entry attaches as soon as title is acquired by a purchaser under a deed of trust containing an agreement by the mortgagor that the relation of landlord and tenant will be created by a foreclosure of the deed. Griffith v. Brackman (Tenn.) 435

4. No express reservation of a formal right of re-entry by the purchaser under a deed of trust is necessary where such deed contains a stipulation that a foreclosure thereof shall create the relation of landlord and tenant between the mortgagor and purchaser, and that if the former refuses to surrender possession he shall be removable by the writ of unlawful detainer. Griffith v. Brackman (Tenn.) 435

5. The maker of a deed of trust in possession may contract in such deed with the trustee that foreclosure of the deed of trust shall create the relation of landlord and tenant between the purchaser and mortgagor, and that upon the latter's default in surrendering possession he may be removed by writ of unlawful detainer. *Griffith v. A determination of an election contest for the offices of governor and lieutenant governor, by the legislature, which by Ky. Const. § 90, is made the sole tribunal to determine such contest, and which proceeds under Ky. Stat. § 1596a, suba. 8, by referring the matter to a board, and receives its report before determining the contest, cannot be reviewed by the courts on the grounds that the notice of contest or the evidence was insufficient, or that the contest board was not fairly drawn by lot, as required by statute, or that the election should have been held void, where the findings by the legislature do not show that it was void. *Taylor v. MANDAMUS.

1. Mandamus will not be granted to compel a gas company to furnish gas to a consumer pending the settlement of a dispute over a bill rendered for gas alleged to have been previously furnished. Mackin v. Portland Gas Co. (Or.) 596

2. The interest of a citizen in having the right of the public enforced under an ordinance limiting the rates of fare to be charged by a street-railway company is sufficient to enable him to be a relator in a petition for mandamus to enforce it. People ex rel. Jackson v. Suburban R. Co. (Ill.) 650

3. The performance of conditions beneficial to a municipality, on which a street-railway company is expressly required to accept from municipal authorities the privilege of using the streets, is not the performance of a mere private contract, but is the performance of a duty to the public which may be compelled by mandamus. People ex rel. Jackson v. Suburban R. Co. (Ill.) 650

4. Final judgment on an issue of law on which both parties have been fully heard should be rendered on overruling a demurrer to the petition in a mandamus proceeding, notwithstanding an application for permission to raise an issue of fact, where it is substantially admitted that the averments of the petition were true at the time they were made, and the entire argument on behalf of the respondent is as to the legal right to do what the petition complains of. *People ex rel. 1. The duty to pay orders issued by a de facto town which is subsequently dissolved in a direct proceeding for that purpose devolves upon the towns from which the territory was taken and to which it returns after the dissolution. Gilkey v. Howe (Wis.) 483

2. To render enforceable orders issued by a town organized under statutory authority, the requirements of the statute need not be shown to have been substantially complied with, it being sufficient to show a valid law authorizing the incorporation, and a bona fide attempt to comply with it. Gilkey v. Howe (Wis.) 483

3. A penal ordinance prohibiting any colored netting or other material which has a tendency to conceal the true color or quality of the goods to be used for covering any box, basket, or other package of fruit, berries, or vegetables of any kind, is a vexatious and unreasonable interference with and restriction upon the rights of dealers in fruit, and is therefore void when based only on the general police power of the city. Frost v. Chicago (Ill.) 657

4. The choice of the method by which the current expense warrants of a city shall be paid is left to the discretion of the council, where it has authority to levy taxes to pay such warrants, and to borrow money and issue bonds. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

5. Bonds do not contravene the limitation of municipal indebtedness, which are issued to take up what the city is estopped to deny are just debts, although the total indebtedness exceeds the permitted amount. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

6. That the indebtedness of a city was temporarily increased beyond the prescribed limit by the sale of bonds and failure immediately to apply the proceeds to retire existing indebtedness will not defeat them in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, where they might have been exchanged directly for the existing evidences of debt, so that there would have been no unlawful increase, which method duty required the municipal authorities to pursue. Huron v. Second Ward Sav. Bank (C. C. App. 8th C.) 534

7. A city does not become indebted beyond its constitutional limit by a contract under which a person is to erect upon its land a city hall, to be leased to the city at an agreed and fair rental for a term of years, with the option to purchase the building, or, if this is not exercised, with an option to the lessor to remove it or buy the land at its statutory appraised valuation, where it does not appear that the current revenues of the city will not be sufficient to pay the indebtedness for rent each year, together with all other expenses for which the city is liable. South Bend v. Reynolds (Ind.) 795

8. An unconstitutional exemption from taxation is not effected by an agreement by a municipal corporation to pay the taxes assessed against a water company in return for a supply of water which constitutes an adequate consideration for the agreement. Maine Water Co. v. Waterville (Me.) 294

9. A municipal corporation having authority to contract for a water supply may agree to pay a portion of the taxes assessed for any year against a water company, in addition to the specified amount for water to be supplied by the company, if the consideration for the agreement is reasonably adequate, and the contract is reasonable and fair and for a reasonable length of time. Maine Water Co. v. Waterville (Me.) 294

10. A municipal corporation which leaves in a public street near a playground trenches filled with deadly gas, with easy means of access to the bottom, without notice or warning of the danger, may be liable for injury inflicted by the gas upon persons who go into a trench for a ball accidentally there, although the particular consequences of the negligence are not, and could not by any ordinary prudence be, anticipated. *Corbin v. 1. Going into a trench filled with deadly gas, negligently left in a public street by a municipality, to rescue one who, having gone there to recover an article accidentally dropped, has been overcome by the gas, is not, as a matter of law, such negligence as will relieve the municipality from liability for the rescuer's death in case he also is overcome and dies. Corbin v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 715

2. The rider of a bicycle is not required to give way to a heavily laden wagon when turning a corner and keeping on the right side of the street, as required by the law of the road and the express terms of an ordinance, unless some apparent necessity is shown for an exception to the rule. Footte v. American Product Co. (Pa.) 764

3. One riding a bicycle, as he approaches a corner keeping on the right side of the street, has a right to assume that the driver of a wagon approaching the corner from another direction will keep to the right if they meet, so that the bicycle can pass between the wagon and the curb. Footte v. American Product Co. (Pa.) 764

4. A boy on a bicycle, who is placed in a dangerous position by the negligence or carelessness of the driver of a wagon, will not be held to the same strict measure of care as under ordinary circumstances, in attempting to release himself from the perilous situation. Footte v. American Product Co. (Pa.) 764

5. One who, by reason of his own voluntary intoxication, exposes himself to danger and receives injuries which he could, and by the exercise of ordinary prudence would, have avoided if sober, is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover for such injuries. *Bageard v. PARDON.

1. A pardon is an act of grace, proceeding from the powers intrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual upon whom it is bestowed from the punishment which the law inflicts for the commission of a crime. It is a remission of guilt, and a declaration of record by the authorized authority that a particular individual is to be relieved from the legal consequences of a particular crime. Territory v. Richardson (Okla.) 440

2. A pardon extends to every offense known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment. Territory v. Richardson (Okla.) 440

3. A territorial legislature has no power to impose limitations upon the manner in which the pardoning power shall be used, set up, alleged, or called to the notice of the court as a defense. Territory v. Richardson (Okla.) 440

4. A pardon granted by the governor in the exercise of his constitutional authority is not invalid because it was not procured in pursuance of statutory regulations. Territory v. Richardson (Okla.) 440

5. In order to impeach a pardon for fraud it must be done in a direct manner, and not collaterally by contesting its validity when set up as a bar to a prosecution. Territory v. Richardson (Okla.) 440

6. The benefit of a pardon as a bar to a prosecution is not waived by a plea of not guilty, or by other steps taken in the proceedings, but the pardon may be set up at any time or stage of the proceedings before the execution of the sentence. Territory v. Richardson (Okla.) 440

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Partition; by bill in equity; of mining interests. 464

What Constitutes, see LANDLORD AND TENANT, 1.

Appointment of Receiver for, see RECEIVERS, 1.

1. A mining partnership is created where tenants in common or joint tenants of an oil lease or mine unite and co-operate in working it. Childers v. Neely (W. Va.) 468

2. Those who own a majority interest control the management of a mining partnership in all things necessary and proper for its operation, if the members cannot agree in the management. Childers v. Neely (W. Va.) 468

3. A mining partnership is not dissolved by the sale of the interest of one member to another member or to a stranger, although this would dissolve an ordinary partnership. Childers v. Neely (W. Va.) 468

4. Partners have a lien on the social property for advances or a balance due them after debts, but not on the property or product of the business after it has been divided between the members in severalty, as in case 49 L. R. A.

of division orders by which partners, by agreement, have had pipe lines deliver to each of them a certificate of his share of oil produced from their wells. Childers v. Neely (W. Va.) 468

5. A partner is personally accountable in an accounting between the members for any loss which comes to the firm by his culpable negligence, breach of duty, or wrongful conduct, or by his diversion of the social property from the firm business to other business. Childers v. Neely (W. Va.) 468

6. A decree for dissolution of a partnership and full account should be granted, but not one for merely a partial account, where the bill demands a dissolution and abundant cause therefor is shown, as in case the business is hopeless of success and prosperity, and one partner has the property entirely in his hands and management, excluding the other therefrom. *Childers v. 2. A fright and nervous shock sustained by a passenger on account of the horrors incident to a collision, while remaining on a railroad embankment after climbing out of a deep trench, must be deemed general, and not special, damages, which are recoverable under general allegations as to bodily pain and mental anguish caused by the violence of the collision and by being forced to alight from the coach. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller (C. C. App. 9th C.) 77

3. A complaint which sets forth a conspiracy to commit a wrong and acts pursuant thereto, resulting in injury to the plaintiff, states a case in tort, and not for breach of contract, although the wrong done was in violation of a contract. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

4. An exception to the allegations of a petition on the ground of indefiniteness should be sustained where it merely sets out the conclusions of the pleader as to the legal effect of an ordinance prescribing regulations for the suspension of electric wires, and fails to state in terms or in substance the provisions of the ordinance. *Brush Electric Light & P. 5. Knowledge by a carrier of a dangerous practice by its employees is implied from an allegation in a complaint that it, by its servants, made a practice of permitting and allowing the act to be done in a manner and at a place which subjected the person or persons who might chance to be lawfully upon the premises to hazard. *Shaw v. 7. The facts embodied in a supplemental complaint under the North Dakota Code must relate to the cause of action set forth in the original complaint, and must be in aid thereof. Swedish American Nat. Bank v. Dickinson Co. (N. D.) 285

8. It is not proper to bring into a case, by supplemental complaint, new facts which have arisen since the action was commenced, and which by themselves constitute a new and independent cause of action, without reference to the facts alleged in the original pleading. Swedish American Nat. Bank v. Dickinson Co. (N. D.) 285

9. A judgment sustaining a cause of action on an insurance policy does not depart from the cause of action pleaded because it holds that there has not been any forfeiture of the policy by nonpayment of premiums, for the reason that the insurer had not given notices required by a statute, although that statute is not pleaded by either party. Mutual L. R. A.

tual L. Ins. Co. v. Dingley (C. C. App. 9th C.) 132

10. Permitting a recovery in an action upon a policy of insurance, on the ground that there had been no forfeiture for failure to pay premiums because the requisite statutory notice of their accrual had not been given, which fact does not appear in the complaint, does not contravene the rule against departure in pleading, since forfeiture is a matter of defense, which the plaintiff is not bound to anticipate. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hill (C. C. App. 9th C.) 127

1. A special assessment of property for a local improvement must be limited to the benefits which it actually receives. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

2. The legislature may declare conclusively that special assessments on account of local improvements within a taxing district shall be limited to property within that district. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

3. The legislature may create, or authorize a municipality to create, a local taxing district for local improvement purposes, which includes part only of the property within the municipality. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

4. A taxing district as a whole may be assessed on account of a local improvement therein, only to the extent of the sum of the special benefits actually received by the several parcels of contributing property. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

5. A primary obligation is imposed upon a city for such deficit, if any, as there may be in the special benefits received to meet the cost of a local street improvement, where the assessment scheme is pursued in making such improvements,—especially where the statute expressly makes the city liable to the contractor for the contract price. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

6. The cost of a local improvement in excess of the special benefits resulting to the several parcels of property in the taxing district must be borne by the general treasury on account of the benefit to the municipality at large. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

7. Property owners affected by an improvement within a taxing district are entitled to a hearing on the question of special benefits. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

8. An ordinance for the assessment upon abutters of the cost of filling with rich dirt and sodding between sidewalk and curb is not authorized by a statute providing for grading and paving the street or the sidewalk. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

9. Property is not taken without due process of law by an assessment for a local improvement under Ind. Acts 1889, p. 237, 49 L. R. A.

authorizing by § 3 an estimate of the assessments on the basis of frontage, but providing in § 7 for a hearing of persons aggrieved before the assessment is made, as this provision impliedly authorizes and requires an adjustment of the assessments in conformity with the actual benefits. Adams v. Shelbyville (Ind.) 797

10. An assessment upon land of the full amount of compensation paid for other land of the owner taken for the purpose of a public highway, together with all the cost and expense of the condemnation proceedings, violates Ohio Const. art. 1, § 19, providing that private property shall ever be held inviolate, and, when taken for public use, a compensation therefor shall first be made in money, without deduction for benefits, which is a limitation upon the power of assessment conferred by art. 13, § 6. Cincinnati, L. & N. R. Co. v. Cincinnati (Ohio) 566

11. A rural highway is not a local improvement for the cost of which a local assessment on farm land can be laid, under Minn. Const. art. 9, § 1, authorizing special assessments for local improvements, but providing that all other taxes shall be as nearly equal as may be. Sperry v. Flygare (Minn.) 757

1. A railroad company owes no duty to the landowner at whose instance and for whose convenience and upon whose land gates are put into the railroad fence, or to those in privity with him, to keep such gates closed. Its full duty is performed if the gates are kept in reasonably good repair. Swanson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Minn.) 625

2. It is the duty of the landowner, for whose benefit and convenience gates are constructed and placed in a railroad right-of-way fence at a private farm crossing upon the land of such owner, to keep such gates closed. Swanson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Minn.) 625

3. A railway company is not liable for the death of a person walking upon its track, going in the same direction as the train which killed him, in open daylight, on a straight piece of road, where he could have seen the train for 150 yards, and had power, up to the last moment, to prevent the accident, although the railroad company was guilty of negligence in running its engine at a prohibited rate of speed, and in not ringing its bell as required by ordinance, and in not keeping a proper lookout. Neal v. Carolina C. R. Co. (N. C.) 684

4. No duty of care to avoid injury to trespassers by a railroad train arises until those in charge of the train have discovered their presence on or dangerously near the track, and have reasonable cause to believe that injury will result unless the progress of the train is arrested, although by the exercise of due care their presence might have been sooner discovered, and the train is running at an unlawful rate of speed. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Tartt (C. C. App. 7th C.) 98

5. It is not the duty of trainmen to arrest the progress of a train as soon as they discover a trespasser on or dangerously near the track; but they have the right to proceed on the assumption that the trespasser, having a due regard for his own personal safety, will voluntarily withdraw from the track, and not remain in a place of known danger until he is injured or killed. *Cleveland, C. 2. A receiver of an insolvent corporation cannot maintain an action in his own name for secret profits of promoters, if the claims have not been assigned to him. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

3. The appointment of a receiver to "collect, take possession of, preserve, and care for" the property of an insolvent corporation does not transfer to him the title to choses in action, so that he can sue thereon in his own name. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

4. That suits to recover secret profits from promoters are prosecuted by a receiver of the corporation for the exclusive benefit of part only of the creditors is immaterial, if they alone contribute to the expenses of the suit. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

5. A receiver appointed to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders of an insolvent corporation, who, under the statute, has legal title to the fund as trustee for creditors, and who is the only person who can legally demand and collect the money, may bring actions against stockholders in his own name, in courts of other states. Howarth v. Lombard (Mass.) 301

6. Persons for whose benefit a suit is prosecuted to recover secret profits made by promoters of a corporation, by a receiver appointed for it in another jurisdiction, need not be shown to be creditors of the corporation to maintain the jurisdiction of the court in which the suit is brought, since that is a question for the court which appointed the receiver and directed the bringing of the suit. Hayward v. Leeson (Mass.) 725

7. The claim that a bill for a receivership was not filed under Md. Code Gen. Pub. Laws, art. 23, §§ 264, 264a, relating to the dissolution and winding up of insolvent corporations, and that therefore the court had no jurisdiction to decree dissolution, cannot be set up by the officers of the corporation to defeat an action by the receivers against them to recover the amount of unlawful preferences, where the decree was made at their instance, and provides that the estate and assets of the corporation shall be administered according to the insolvent law, and that the receivers shall have the same powers as to setting aside illegal preferences which are thereby given to permanent trustees. *James Clark Co. v. SCHOOLS.

A statute providing that pupils outside the limits of a highschool district in the state may attend such school free of charge to them, and that for their tuition an arbitrary sum shall be paid to the district out of the general fund of the county, which may fall below or exceed the cost of such tuition, violates a constitutional provision for uniformity of taxes in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing them, since the taxpayers in the school district may be unfairly burdened by being compelled to pay their portion of the county tax, and, in addition thereto, all the deficiency that there may be in the cost of the tuition of the nonresident pupils. *High School Dist. 2. Specific performance of a contract for real property does not depend upon the complainant's possession of it, when the consideration therefor has been fully performed by maintaining the owner of the property until death and then bearing the expense of burial. Bryson v. McShane (W. Va.) 527

3. Sunday is not to be computed as one of the constitutional five days allowed to the governor in which to return a bill, with his objections. State ex rel. State Pharmaceutical Asso. v. Michel (La.) 218

4. A bill which has passed both houses of the general assembly, and been signed by the presiding officers thereof, is presented to the governor, within the meaning of the Louisiana Constitution, when the clerk of the house of representatives or secretary of the senate carries the same to the executive office, and offers or tenders it to the governor or his secretary. State ex rel. State Pharmaceutical Asso. v. Michel (La.) 218

5. A presentation of a bill to the governor for his signature, within the meaning of a constitutional provision which allows five days after its presentation to him for his action thereon in the way of a veto, is duly made when the bill is properly tendered to him, notwithstanding the fact that he then refuses to receive it. State ex rel. State Pharmaceutical Asso. v. Michel (La.) 218

6. In construing a statute in which a word susceptible of more than one meaning is repeated in different parts of the act, a presumption arises that it is used in the same sense throughout; but the presumption fails where such a construction will nullify the law, if this result can be avoided by any fair and reasonable construction of the whole act. State v. Knowles (Md.) 695

7. The word "may," in an act creating a board of dental examiners, and providing that a graduate from a university or college authorized to grant diplomas in dental surgery may be examined by such board with reference to qualifications, will be construed "must," since the duty of examination is for the benefit of both the public and the applicant. 2. The fact that a call for margins might have been defeated by a party who made the deposit under § 1 of rule 20 of the Chicago 49 L. R. A.

board of trade, by showing that an alleged rise in the market was fictitious, does not preclude him from showing on a hearing before a committee that the alleged rise in the market was fictitious. Ryan v. Cudahy (Ill.) 353

3. The refusal by a committee of the Chicago board of trade to hear evidence that the alleged market price on which the right to a margin deposit depends was fictitious is in violation of § 7 of rule 20, and renders its decision against the party offering such evidence invalid. 2. An order giving a party "until" a certain day to prepare and present a bill of exceptions includes the day named, under a statutory rule that the last day mentioned shall be included in the time within which an act is to be done when required by law. Conway v. Smith Mercantile Co. (Wyo.) 201

3. A "day" within the meaning of a constitutional provision allowing five days for action by a governor upon a bill presented to him begins at 12 o'clock midnight and extends through twenty-four hours to the next 12 o'clock midnight. State ex rel. State Pharmaceutical Asso. v. Michel (La.) 213

4. When the time stipulated is such that it does not necessarily include Sunday, Sunday is excluded from the computation without express mention of the fact. When the time stipulated must necessarily include Sunday, to exclude that day from the computation there must be an express declaration to that effect. *State ex rel. State Pharmaceutical Asso. v. 5. TRADEMARK.

1. The word "Hygeia," as indicating the name of the mythological goddess, is not so merely descriptive of the quality of goods in connection with which it is used that it cannot be protected as a trademark. Hygeia Distilled Water Co. v. Hygeia Ice Co. (Conn.) 147

2. One adopting the name of the Goddess Hygeia as a trademark is entitled to protection against anyone using it upon similar products as indicating their origin, but not to a protection which will result in a partial monopoly of the English word "hygeia." Hygeia Distilled Water Co. v. Hygeia Ice Co. (Conn.) 147

3. The adoption of the name of the Goddess Hygeia as a trademark will not prevent the use of the word "hygeia," in its natural signification of healthfulness, as part of the corporate or business name of a rival, although some injury is thereby done to the owner of the trademark. Hygeia Distilled Water Co. v. Hygeia Ice Co. (Conn.) 147

JURY.

1. A talesman in a justice's court is not to be excused because he is not a taxpayer. Reed v. Peacock (Mich.) 423

2. Odd fellows are not disqualified as jurors in an action by an Odd Fellow of a lodge to which they do not belong, on a lease assigned to him by his lodge. Reed v. Peacock (Mich.) 423

3. The failure to make any objection to the collected jury waives objections to the improper exclusion of questions to individual jurors. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

Questions for court or jury.

4. What is a reasonable time is a question of law, when the facts are not disputed. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers (Ohio) 760

5. The meaning of a by-law and its reasonableness are questions for the court, and not for the jury, when there is no dispute as to the facts. Carney v. New York L. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 471

6. The constitutionality of a statute is a question of law, to be settled by the court, and is not to be submitted to the jury. State v. McKee (Conn.) 542

7. The question whether the matter published by a newspaper comes within the statutory definition is for the court, in a prosecution for selling a paper devoted to the publication of criminal news in violation of statute, where the sale and the fact that the paper was devoted to the publication of the class of matter contained therein are admitted. State v. McKee (Conn.) 542

8. The contributory negligence of a person who goes upon a boat at a wharf, and goes to sleep in the cabin, knowing that contractors are blasting near by, is a question for the jury. Smith v. Day (C. C. App. 9th C.) 108

9. Whether or not a passenger was negligent in failing to look and listen for approaching trains before crossing a track between the place where he alighted from the train and the public highway is a question for the jury. Cheasapeake & O. R. Co. v. King (C. C. App. 6th C.) 102

Submission to jury.

10. The trial court is not bound, on request for a special verdict, to submit to the jury questions covering uncontroverted facts. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

11. The question of the contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate, killed by a railroad train, is for the court, where there is no contradiction in his evidence, and defendant, who submits no other evidence, demurs to that offered by plaintiff, thereby admitting its truth, and moves for a nonsuit. Neal v. Carolina C. R. Co. (N. C.) 684

12. When the evidence offered by plaintiff to make out his cause of action to recover the value of a mill destroyed by sparks from defendant's locomotive creates a presumption of negligence on the part of defendant, the case should be submitted to the jury unless the rebutting evidence is so clear and circumstantial that no reasonable person could doubt its verity. McCullen v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 642

13. It is for the jury to say whether or not the presumption of negligence raised against a railroad company by setting fire to adjacent property by sparks from a passing locomotive has been overcome by proof on the part of the company that the locomotive was properly equipped and handled. McCullen v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 642

14. The question whether a mill was set on fire by sparks from a passing locomotive should be submitted to the jury where the evidence tends to show that the passing of the train and the starting of the fire were nearly related in point of time, that the fire caught on the outside of the ventilator slats, that there was no fire on the inside underneath the ventilator, that the direction of the wind would naturally carry sparks to the mill, that the locomotive was laboring on an up grade, and was observed only a short distance from the fire, to be emitting sparks which floated for some distance, that it was not impossible for sparks to have been carried to the mill, and that there was no other adequate cause for the fire. McCullen v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 642

Directing verdict.

15. Directing a judgment for defendant, notwithstanding a verdict for plaintiff under an erroneous instruction of a presumption in his favor, on which he relied and therefore failed to prove a cause of action, is error, as a new trial should be ordered. Jones v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (Minn.) 640

Instructions.

16. The refusal of instructions prepared by counsel, although they contain correct principles of law applicable to the case, is not erroneous if the charge of the court in its entirety fairly covers the legal propositions necessary to give instructions upon. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller (C. C. App. 9th C.) 77

17. An instruction in an action for a conspiracy, that damages are of three kinds, actual, compensatory, and exemplary, and which proceeds to distinguish between actual and compensatory damages, and to say that the jury must at least find for the actual damages, is erroneous, but the jury should be told that compensatory damages may be recovered, and then instructed as to the elements of such damages. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

Verdict.

18. The denial of a special verdict, to which the moving party has an absolute right under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 2858, cannot 49 L. R. A.

be justified by the court's attempting to shift upon counsel the duty of preparing the form of the special verdict, and by counsel's failure to do so before the argument to the jury is commenced. Gatzow v. Buening (Wis.) 475

1. A provision in a bond for a greater than the legal rate of interest after maturity, by way of a penalty to insure a prompt payment of the debt, does not render the bond usurious. Ward v. Cornett (Va.) 550

2. A deed of trust to secure payment, "with interest," of an extended bond which provided for usurious interest as a penalty for not paying it at maturity, will not be usurious, since, the legal interest being a penalty, the bond will only bear legal interest after maturity as before. Ward v. Cornett (Va.) 550

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Usury; in agreement for interest after maturity:—Lump sum, a penalty; where debtor can relieve himself; agreement for reduction for prompt payment; provision for interest only in case of default; legality of higher rate; statutory limitation; in case of sales; various constructions; express penalty; understanding that loan shall continue; notes held valid; equitable relief; other decisions. 550

VACCINATION.

Burden of Proof as to, see EVIDENCE, 4.

1. Authorizing county and municipal authorities to require compulsory vaccination is within the power of the legislature unless forbidden by the Constitution. State v. Hay (N. C.) 588

2. A statute permitting municipal authorities to make regulations "for the vaccination of its inhabitants under the direction of" the local board of health does not require the board of health to act in conjunction with the aldermen in passing the ordinance. State v. Hay (N. C.) 588

3. An ordinance requiring compulsory vaccination is not vitiated by failure to except from its operation persons whose health is such that it would be unsafe for them to submit to vaccination. State v. Hay (N. C.) 588

4. Failure to comply with an ordinance requiring compulsory vaccination is not justified by one's own opinion, or that of his personal physician, that it would be dangerous for him to be vaccinated, or that he is sufficiently protected by former vaccination. State v. Hay (N. C.) 588

WITNESSES.

See also HABEAS CORPUS, 2.

1. A witness may be compelled to answer a question against his claim of privilege on the ground that his answer might tend to incriminate him, if the court decides that there is no tangible or substantial probability that any direct answer to the question would implicate him. Ex parte Miskimins (Wyo.) 831

2. A constitutional provision that no one shall be compelled to give incriminating evidence against himself will protect against the extortion of the evidence, although, if given, it could not be used in any prosecution against the witness. Ex parte Miskimins (Wyo.) 831

3. One charged with compounding a felony by refusing to testify against accused cannot, although the information against him has been dismissed, be compelled to give evidence to prove the commission of the felony, since that would be one link in establishing his guilt of compounding it. Ex parte Miskimins (Wyo.) 831

4. The question of the good faith of a witness in claiming privilege against giving self-incriminating testimony does not depend upon his attitude towards the prosecution, but upon his belief as to the effect of his answer. Ex parte Miskimins (Wyo.) 831
